We must not, however, here expect a full and particular history of the labours and successes of the apostles and primitive evangelists: a select specimen alone is given. After the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the first successes and sufferings of the apostles, little is recorded in the scripture concerning most of them. Indeed the names of more than half of them are never mentioned after the first chapter: yet it cannot reasonably be doubted, that they laboured, suffered, and prospered, as their brethren did; though most of the ancient records and traditions concerning them are so mingled with fiction, as not to be entitled to implicit or indiscriminate credit. Some other labourers are likewise brought forward, as Stephen the first martyr, Philip the evangelist, Barnabas, Silas, and others. But the conversion of Saul the persecutor, with his subsequent labours, sufferings, and triumphs, as the apostle of the gentiles, occupies a large proportion of the book; and the mention of the other apostles, in that part of the history, is occasional and brief. Peter, indeed, the apostle of the circumcision, was chosen to instruct Cornelius and his friends, (the first fruits from among the gentiles,) doubtless to avoid giving needless offence to the Jews; and the martyrdom of James the brother of John is briefly related. Indeed the labours of St. Paul himself are recorded in a very compendious manner. The events of several years are summed up in two or three chapters. And though, after Luke the historian joined the apostle, and became his faithful companion, (which is shewn by his using the first person plural in the narrative,) he is somewhat more circumstantial: yet the epistles of St. Paul prove, that his labours, persecutions, and successes were far greater, and the instructions which he gave his converts, far more particular, than a cursory reading of this history would lead us to suppose. At the same time, the remarkable coincidence, even in minute particulars, of the history and the epistles, is of such a nature, as could never have taken place, had not both been genuine; which will appear more fully, when the epistles come under our consideration.

But the book, on which we now enter, contains also a specimen of true believers, as illustrating the nature and effects of genuine Christianity: and it should be carefully noted, that in every age, all those multitudes who are called Christians, yet bear no resemblance to this specimen, will be driven away as chaff, at the great decisive day: and that the more we are like these primitive believers, when “great grace was upon them all,” the more evident it is, that we shall ‘be numbered with them in glory everlasting.’—Some intimations are also given of the manner, in which the primitive church was constituted and governed, its ministers were appointed, and its ordinances administered: yet it can hardly be supposed, but that the eager disputants of all those parties, into which the church is at present unhappily divided, must feel considerably disappointed in this respect; and secretly regret, that more particular and explicit information has not been given on these subjects: but this the Lord for wise reasons has seen good to withhold.

CHAP. I.

The sacred writer addresses his narrative to Theophilus, 1. Christ being risen, instructs his disciples; commands them to wait at Jerusalem, for the promise of the Holy Spirit; and ascends towards heaven in their sight, 2—9. Two angels assure them, that he would come again in like manner, 10, 11. The apostles and disciples at Jerusalem continue in prayer, with one accord, 12—14. Peter calls on them to appoint another apostle instead of Judas, in whose awful doom the scripture had been fulfilled, 15—22. Matthias is chosen by lot, accompanied with prayer, 23—26.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Luke began this history by referring his pious friend, Theophilus, to that gospel, which formed the introduction to it. (Note, Luke i. 1—4.) He had there given a specimen of the miracles, actions, and doctrine of Christ, and the general scope of all that he did and taught, from his entrance on his publick ministry at his baptism by John, till his ascension into heaven, after that he had given proper instructions and injunctions to his chosen apostles. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Luke xxiv. 50—53.)—The phrase, “began both, &c.” simply means, what Jesus had done and taught, from the beginning to the close of his publick ministry.—The use of the word “all” in this connexion, when so many miracles and discourses of our Lord, are recorded by the other evangelists, is a full demonstration, that arguments tending to establish universal conclusions, from this general term, must be precarious. (Note, John i. 6—9.)—The expression “by the Holy Ghost,” may either refer to our Lord’s choosing the apostles, or to his giving them commandments after his resurrection: but the latter seems to be intended; as he “breathed upon them, and bade them receive the Holy Ghost;” and as he then “opened their understandings, “that they might understand the scriptures.” (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, Luke xxiv. 44—49. John xx. 19—23, vv. 22, 23.) All those things which Jesus did and taught, in respect of his human nature, are ascribed to the Holy Spirit; as well as the endowments which he conferred upon his disciples.—It is also stated, that Jesus “shewed himself alive” to his apostles, after his death, by many signs, or evidences, which could not possibly deceive them: (Note, John xx. 24—29:) as he was seen of them, at different times, for the space of forty days, and conversed freely with them concerning those things, which related to the establishment, privileges, and laws of that “kingdom of God,” which was about to be set up on earth, by the preaching of his gospel. (Marg. Ref. h. k.—Note, Matt. iii. 2.)—^c By speaking to, by walking, and by eating with, ^c them, he gave them certain indication that he lived;

‘that he was seen and handled by them, was a sure evidence that he had a true and natural body; that he permitted Thomas to view the scars of his hands and feet, and put his hand into his side, was a certain token that the body raised was the same which was crucified, and pierced by the soldier’s lance. ... “Concerning the kingdom of God.” Namely, Of teaching the doctrine of this kingdom to all nations, and receiving them into it by baptism, who believed, and professed to own it; of the benefits which were promised to them who cordially believed their doctrine, and the condemnation which belonged to them who would not believe it; of the encouragements and assistances he would afford them in the propagation of it, by his continual presence with them, and the assistance of his Spirit; and by the miracles by which their doctrine should be confirmed.’ Whitby. It is, however, highly probable, that a great deal more passed on these most interesting subjects, between our Lord and his apostles in the course of the forty days preceding his ascension, than is any where recorded.

V. 4—8. The apostles and disciples, no doubt, returned from Galilee to Jerusalem, and assembled there, by their Lord’s appointment. (Notes, Matt. xxviii. 18. Luke xxiv. 50—53.)—He was about to be taken from them, and they might seem to be without employment in that city: yet they were charged “not to depart thence;” but to wait there for the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, which he had promised to send them from the Father. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, John xiv. 15—17. 25, 26. xv. 26, 27. xvi. 7—13.) For it was proper that this extraordinary event should occur in the very place, where Jesus had before been pub-

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, ^p Lord, wilt thou at this time ^q restore again the kingdom to Israel? ^r And he said unto them, 'It is not for you to know the times, or the seasons, ' which the Father hath put in his own power.

7 But 'ye shall receive * power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: ^u and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, ^x and in Samaria, and ^y unto the uttermost part of the earth.

8 And ^z when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up: 'and a cloud received him out of their sight.

9 And ^a while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, ^b two men stood by them in white apparel; ^c 11 Which also said, ^d 'Ye men of Galilee, ^e why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, ^f shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem, ^g from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem ^h a sabbath-day's journey.

lickly crucified. This would fully answer to what John had testified concerning him; as it would be a most remarkable baptism by the Holy Spirit, both communicating to them miraculous powers, and more abundantly illuminating and sanctifying their souls. This took place on the tenth day after our Lord's ascension. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, ii. 1—4. Matt. iii. 11, 12.)—But, notwithstanding all which he had taught them, they still entertained some thoughts of a temporal kingdom: (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Matt. xviii. 1—4. xxiv. 3:) perhaps they supposed, that the pouring out of the Holy Spirit would induce the nation, in general, to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; and that he would then perform, what they supposed to be the meaning of the ancient prophets in this respect, (Note, iii. 19—21, v. 21.) Yet they seem to have feared, lest the base usage, which he had received from the rulers and people of Israel, should deter him from "restoring the kingdom" to the nation, as in the days of David and Solomon. Our Lord, however, knew that his ascension, and the descent of the Holy Spirit would finally terminate these expectations: he therefore checked their curiosity, by observing, that it was not proper for them to know these matters; which were entirely at the disposal of God, to be managed and effected by his sovereign power and authority, "and according to the counsel of his own will," with which no one must presume to interfere. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Deut. xxix. 29. Matt. xxiv. 36—41, v. 36. John xxi. 18—23, v. 22. 1 Thes. v. 1—3.) But he assured them, that they would be endued with the Holy Spirit, enabling them to perform many wonderful works; as well as emboldening and strengthening them for their work, and giving them abundant success in it. Thus they would become witnesses of his resurrection, ascension, miracles, and doctrine, in all parts of the earth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—y.—Notes, Luke xxiv. 44—49. John xv. 26, 27.)—The apostles seem to have understood, that they were authorized to preach to the Samaritans, who were circumcised, and observed many parts of the ceremonial law, though in many respects both heretical and schismatical: but they were not aware, till long after, that uncircumcised gentiles were to be admitted into the kingdom of their

Lord, without any regard to the rites of the Mosaick law. (Notes, iii. 19—21, v. 21. viii. 5—8. 14—17. x. 9—23. 36—48. xi. 1—18.) It is, however, not only difficult, but perhaps impossible, to delineate, with any tolerable precision, the state of the apostles' minds at this crisis; in which darkness and light, hopes and fears, carnal and spiritual views and expectations, were blended so intimately, that almighty power alone could separate them. And this was done, at once, and effectually, in most things, by the descent of the Holy Spirit: though in a few particulars, they were left for some time longer, under a degree of error or prejudice.—The change wrought in the minds and hearts of the apostles, on the day of Pentecost, was as truly miraculous as the gift of tongues. They were no longer the same men; nay, in many respects, men of a widely different spirit and character, possessing an enlargement of mind, and a superiority to carnal prejudices, hopes, and fears, beyond what could have possibly been previously conceived.

V. 9—12. The instructions and promises, which have been considered, seem to have been delivered, as our Lord was leading the disciples forth to that part of the mount of Olives, whence he ascended: after which he was gradually raised from the earth, in their sight, till a cloud intercepted their view of him. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, 2 Kings ii. 11. Luke xxiv. 50—53.) And while they looked earnestly after him, with mixed astonishment, regret, and exultation; two angels, in the form of men, accosted them, demanding why they gazed after their ascended Lord, as if they either desired his present return, or counted him lost to them. For, though he was now ascended to his glorious throne in heaven, to return no more, to reside on earth in his former condition; yet he would assuredly come at length, in a visible manner, in the clouds of heaven, to judge the world, and to gather to himself all his believing people, as he had often promised them. (Marg. Ref. b—f.—Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46. xxvi. 63—68. John xiv. 1—3. 1 Thes. iv. 13—18. 2 Thes. i. 5—10. ii. 1, 2. Heb. ix. 24—28. Rev. i. 7.) Upon this they returned to Jerusalem from mount Olivet.—The place belonging to the village of Bethany, from which Jesus ascended was about a mile distant from Jerusalem: this was called a sabbath-day's journey; probably, because it might generally be necessary to go so far on that day, in order to attend the service of the synagogue.

V. 13, 14. Many have supposed, that this "upper room" was one of the chambers belonging to the temple. But 'these chambers were all appointed for sacred things or persons: how improbable therefore is it, that 'poor fishermen, and Galileans, odious for their Master's sake, should be permitted to crowd, in such numbers, 'into one of these rooms!' Whitby.—The circumstance of the disciples being "continually in the temple," (Luke xxiv. 53.) only shews that they resorted from their lodgings or place of assembling, to the temple, at proper hours. (Notes, ii. 44—47. iii. 1—11, v. 1.) Others have conjectured, that the company met in the house of Mary, mother to John Mark: (xii. 12:) but even this, though far more probable, is altogether uncertain.—'The assemblies of the church, to hear the word, and to join in common prayers, were first instituted and celebrated by apostolical authority, in a private house.'—The brethren, or kinsmen, of our Lord, seem to have been the same, who formerly did not believe in him. (Notes, Mark iii. 20, 21. 31—35. John vii. 3—10.)—This is the last time, in which Mary, the mother of Jesus, is mentioned in scripture: and it is in a very cursory manner, as one of the company who joined in prayer; but without any peculiar distinction, or the least appearance of her exercising authority over the apostles, or even of giving them counsel, or at all interfering in their measures.—*Peter, &c. V. 15. The whole number of disciples, collected together at this time, was about one hundred and twenty. The seventy disciples, probably, were a part of them: but most of the five hundred brethren, who saw Jesus in Galilee before his ascension, had remained there; and doubtless many others believed in him in different parts of the land. V. 16—18. While the disciples were continually uniting together in persevering prayer and supplication, it occurred to Peter, to propose the appointment of another apostle, in the place of the traitor Judas, that the number of twelve might be restored. Peter's guilt in denying his Lord had been so great, as at first sight to appear almost like that of Judas: it is therefore most reasonable to suppose, that he was directed by a divine admonition, to take the lead on this occasion; and the whole transaction shewed, how fully all concerned were satisfied, that he was sincerely and deeply penitent.—In his address he called the disciples "Men and brethren." Our Lord never thus addressed the people; and perhaps it implied an equality, not suitable to the dignity of his character: but the apostles frequently did in speaking to Jews, as well as Christians; yet never in addressing the Gentiles: and it seems to imply, that they recognized a two-fold relation to them, as men of the same nature descended from Adam, and as brethren of the same favoured family as descended from Abraham. (Marg. Ref. b.)—Peter reminded the disciples, that the words, not of David, but of the Holy Spirit, speaking by David, concerning Judas, when he prophesied of Christ, or spake as a type of him, had been exactly fulfilled. (*Marg. This verse seems to come in as a parenthesis, and to be the words, not of the apostle, but of the historian; who informed his readers, that this event became generally known to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and that the field, which had been bought with the price of the blood of Jesus, and which cost Judas his life also, was commonly called “the field of blood,” at the time when the history was written.—It is remarkable, that he does not say, in our, but their proper tongue, and this, I think, shews that the writer was not a Hebrew, but either a Hellenist, or a Gentile. (Preface to Luke. Note, Matt. xxvii. 6—10, v. 8.) Some think, that Judas also was buried in this field; if so, he bought a burying-place among strangers for himself, with “the wages of his iniquity.” (Notes, Num. xxxi. 8. 2 Pet. ii. 15, 16.)

V. 20—22. The apostle proceeded to observe, that as the scriptures had been fulfilled in the doom of Judas, so the same scriptures pointed out to them what their present conduct ought to be: for as it was predicted that “his habitation should be desolate;” so it was directed, that another should take his office and charge. It behoved them, therefore, to take one of their company, who had attended on Jesus with them, from the very beginning of his ministry to his ascension into heaven; that he might be solemnly set apart, to be, with them, a witness of his resurrection, as well as to perform other parts of the apostolical office.—Let his, &c. (20) This varies considerably from the LXX, and also from the Hebrew, especially as the plural pronoun is used in both. V. 23—26. As the other apostles and disciples perceived the propriety of Peter’s proposal, they proceeded to select two persons, according to the best of their judgment, for this important service: probably, they had both been of the number of the seventy disciples, and were eminent for wisdom and integrity. But, being unable to decide whether of them was the most proper for the charge, they referred the matter by prayer, and by casting lots, to the Lord’s determination. As Jesus had personally appointed the other apostles, many expositors have argued, that this prayer was immediately addressed to him; and the language favours the supposition. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)

CHAP. II.

The day of Pentecost being come, the Holy Spirit is poured out on the assembled disciples, with "a sound as of a mighty wind;" while "cloven tongues as of fire" rest on each of them, 1—3. They speak divers languages, in the hearing of multitudes from many nations, who are come together on the occasion; at which most are amazed, but some deride, 4—13. Peter shews, that this is the fulfilment of a prophecy of Joel, 14—21; that Jesus, whom they had crucified, was risen from the dead, according to the prophecy of David, 22—32; and that being ascended into heaven, and exalted at the right hand of God, he had poured out the Holy Spirit, to demonstrate that he was the promised Messiah, 33—36. They are pricked to the heart, and enquire what they must do, 37. Peter exhorts and encourages them to repent, and to be baptized in the name of Jesus, 38—40. Three thousand are added to the church, 41. They continue stedfast in the faith, 42. Many miracles are wrought by the apostles, 43. The disciples have all things in common, and abound in love, joy, and praise; while numbers are daily added to them, 44—47.

They, however, appealed to the Searcher of all hearts, to determine whether of the two he had chosen, to take part of the authority, trust, and labour of the apostleship; from which Judas had fallen by his atrocious crime, to go to that dreadful place of punishment, to which he was righteously condemned. In answer to this appeal, the Lord was pleased that the lot should fall upon Matthias; whom some suppose to have been the same with Nathanael, because both their names signify "the gift of God:" but this is very uncertain. It is remarkable, that Matthias is never mentioned in scripture, except on this occasion, but Barsabas is. (Notes, xv. 22—35, v. 22. 32.) Yet, no doubt, the Lord had wise and holy reasons for choosing Matthias, though they are wholly unknown to us. (Marg. Ref. a—e. —Note, Prov. xvi. 33.)—The prayer offered on this occasion, was wholly unlike what might have been expected from deceivers. It is dictated by a deep sense of the Lord's perfect acquaintance with all hearts, the importance of the cause in which they were engaged, and their incompetency to decide in it without divine direction. The whole account, when compared with the surprising blindness of the disciples, to the true meaning of the prophecies, before the resurrection of Christ, illustrates the evangelist's words, "Then opened he their understandings, to understand the scripture:" (Note, Luke xxiv. 44—49, v. 44:) for there is a constant recurrence to the sacred oracles, and a clear and sound interpretation of the passages adduced.—It is wonderful, that any persons should have referred to this narrative, in the argument concerning the choice of ministers: when the case was most evidently extraordinary, and one which could never again occur; and when the eleven apostles, with a number of the seventy disciples, probably formed the far greater part of the company present.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

While we thankfully peruse the instructive narrative "of all that Jesus began both to do, and to teach;" let us remember, that all instruction should be reduced to practice; and that ministers should begin to do, and then to teach, that their example may illustrate, confirm, and adorn their doctrine. For these ends, we need a daily supply of that Spirit, by which Jesus "gave commandment to his apostles;" that we may be effectually convinced of those truths, which, though authenticated by "infallible proofs," are never cordially and practically believed, till his teaching removes the veil of pride and worldly lusts, from the understanding and the heart. (Notes, 2 Cor. iii. 12—18. iv. 3—6.) Then, and not before, we learn to profit by what Jesus has spoken "concerning the kingdom of God;" and are induced to seek its privileges, and to obey its commandments. We should therefore wait for this "promise of the Father," according to the directions which our Lord has given us. We do not indeed expect the miraculous powers of the Holy Spirit: but we must experience his purifying baptism, or we never can serve God, or be made meet for the inheritance of heaven. In proportion as this is deficient, (for it is communicated in different degrees,) even true believers remain under the influence of carnal prejudices, and cleave to earthly things; by which they are kept in error, or betrayed into curious questions and frivolous speculations. But it behoves us to leave "secret things to the Lord, to whom they belong;" and to submit to his wisdom, in all the dispensations of his providence and grace. (P. O. Job xxviii. 12—28. John xxi. 18—23.) It is enough, that he has engaged to give his people strength adequate to their trials and services: that, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, they may, in one way or other, be witnesses for Christ on earth; while in heaven he manages their concerns with the most perfect wisdom, truth, and love.—In our affections and hopes, we ought to follow our ascended Saviour, that our conversation and our hearts may be in heaven; and that our expectation of his second coming may be stedfast and joyful, by our "giving diligence to be found of him "in peace, without spot and blameless." (Notes, Col. iii. 1—4. 2 Pet. iii. 10—13.)

V. 13—26.

In order to serve the cause of Christ on earth, we should study to be "of one heart" with all his true disciples; that, by mutual conference, we may encourage and animate each other, and that our united prayers may be more fervent, persevering, and uninterrupted. (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 7.) Thus we may have peace, in communion with God and his saints, notwithstanding the enmity and rage of an ungodly world.—As the church of Christ at first consisted of only few persons, so we ought not to "despise the day

“of small things.” (Note, Zech. iv. 8—10.) A little company, united in love, exemplary in their conduct, fervent in prayer, and prudently zealous in promoting the cause of Christ, by every means in their power, will generally increase with rapidity.—We should carefully observe the dispensations of providence, and compare them with the holy scriptures; not only for the confirmation of our faith, but in order to learn our duty: and we ought to point out to our brethren those intimations, which are thus suggested to us; that we may unite our endeavours to do good, as circumstances may require, and occasions may offer.—The crimes and awful end of some ministers, who have been high in rank and reputation in the church, should by no means lead men to despise that sacred calling: but such instances loudly require others, “to look to themselves,” to their motives and intentions, as well as to their doctrine and moral conduct. The nearer men approach to Jesus in profession and office, the more detestable is their treachery, if they secretly concur with his enemies, and betray his cause to them. The gain of hypoerites is “the reward of iniquity,” and it will only purchase for them an “Aeldama, a field of blood,” a more awful condemnation and more notorious infamy: for, if they die impenitent, as it is highly probable they will, in what way soever they leave the world, and whether their habitations be left desolate or flourishing, they must follow Judas to their “own place,” even that prepared for “the workers of iniquity,” and to each of them according to the degree of guilt contracted by him.—But when mercenary and ungodly men are removed; we should beseech the great Searcher of hearts, to fill their places in the church, with such ministers as have known Christ, and are capable of being witnesses for him, and of declaring to others the efficacy of his sufferings, and “the power of his resurrection.” Those who are entrusted in this matter should be careful to “lay hands suddenly on no man:” but, while they do their best, to select the most able and upright persons for this sacred service, they ought to pour out their most earnest prayers to him, “who knoweth what is in man,” to direct their choice, and to determine for them, who are, and who are not, proper persons. (Notes, 1 Tim. v. 21, 22. 24, 25.) Where this is omitted, or when it degenerates into a form; we need not wonder to see the church crowded with drones, hirelings, blind guides, persecutors, and hereticks; instead of faithful, able, disinterested, and laborious ministers of Christ. Indeed in every thing, when we have gone as far as we can, “according to the wisdom given” to us, we should, in one way or other, refer the decision to the Lord: and surely the lot, which, under both the Old and the New Testament dispensation, has been used and owned, as a solemn and religious appeal to God’s providence, to decide doubtful matters for his worshippers, ought not to be used by Christians in such frivolous concerns, or in so irreverent a manner, as it generally is by those who “have

“no fear of God before their eyes.” (Notes, Ex. xx. 17—Josh. xiii. 6. 1 Sam. xiv. 36—44. Prov. xvi. 33.)

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. The word “Pentecost” implies, that this was the fiftieth day; that is, from the second day of unleavened bread, whence “the feast of the in-gathering” of the harvest was computed. The Israelites were commanded to bring a meat-offering of the first-fruits of their corn, at this festival: which was observed, as it is generally supposed, in commemoration of the giving of the law from mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt. (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Ex. xix. 1—xxiii. 14—18. Lev. xxiii. 15—21. Deut. xvi. 9.) At this solemnity, the Lord was pleased to “pour out his Spirit,” and thus to consecrate the first-fruits of the Christian church. Multitudes, from all parts of the country, and from distant regions, were constantly collected at Jerusalem on this occasion: and more than usual seem to have attended this year; perhaps from the general expectation which prevailed, that the Messiah would soon appear. Thus numbers, who at the preceding passover had seen Jesus crucified with ignominy, and had carried the report of it to their several places of abode, would now see this remarkable proof of his resurrection and ascension; and this would every where be made known in like manner.—As Jesus arose on the first day of the week, so the Holy Spirit descended on the same, seven weeks, or on the fiftieth day, afterwards. This tended to honour that day, which was soon to be set apart as the Christian sabbath. (Notes, xx. 7—12, v. 7. John xx. 19—29, vv. 19. 26. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. Rev. i. 9—11, v. 10.)—The day of Pentecost, properly speaking, began the preceding evening; so that in the morning it might be said to be “fully come:” and the apostles, and their company, were then collected together in entire harmony and love; probably in the upper room, where they before assembled for prayer and religious conference. (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, i. 13, 14.) No objection to this can properly be made, on account of the room being too small to hold the multitudes that afterwards came together: for we must suppose, that they surrounded the house where the apostles had been, and that these went out to them: as no building, which they could procure, could possibly hold such immense numbers.—Different opinions are maintained, concerning the persons assembled on this occasion; whether the apostles only, or the whole company of disciples: but the language of the sacred writer obviously implies the latter; the pouring out of the Spirit on all the disciples would form a more exact fulfilment of Joel’s prophecy (18); and it is plain that others, besides the apostles, were “filled with the Holy Ghost,” at a very early period. (vi. 3. 5. 8.) As afterwards, miraculous powers, and the gift of languages, were conferred on others, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; so without this, the gift of tongues was now conferred on converts in general. (Notes, viii. 14—17. x. 44—48.) There seems therefore no sufficient reason for supposing, that this first effusion of the Spirit was exclusively bestowed on the apostles. Indeed, either the apostles assembled together alone, as if for this special purpose, of which no intimation is given; or else the whole company partook of the blessing: and this certainly accords to the tradition of the church in ancient times.

V. 2, 3. While the assembled disciples were thus waiting the performance of the promise, which their Lord had given them; (i. 4. 8;) there came a sound from heaven, resembling that of an impetuous wind, which rushed in and filled the house, where they were sitting. This was an emblem of the invincible energy, with which the Holy Spirit works upon the minds of men; bearing down all opposition before him; in a manner which cannot be explained, but which is most manifest by its effects. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, John iii. 7, 8. 1 Thes. i. 5—8.) At the same time, there appeared the form of "tongues," divided at the tip of them, and resembling fire; one of which rested on each of the whole company. This was an emblem of the gift at this time bestowed upon them, of speaking, with fluency and propriety, divers languages which they had never learned; and the appearance "as of fire," denoted the fervent zeal, with which they were enabled to speak, and the effects which their words produced upon the minds of the hearers. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, Is. vi. 6, 7. Jer. xxiii. 28, 29. Matt. iii. 11, 12.)—The shape of the mitre, worn by bishops, is by some thought to have been derived from the supposed form of these divided tongues; but if they sat on every one present, (as the original determines,) and others besides the apostles were present, the ground of this distinction fails. Indeed it is more likely, that there appeared several divisions in the tongues, than merely two; as the former would be a more exact emblem of the gift of speaking divers languages, conferred at the same time.

V. 4. At the time of these extraordinary appearances, the whole company were abundantly replenished with the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit: (Marg. Ref. i:) so that they "began to speak with other tongues," or in languages of which they had before been entirely ignorant: as also with more distinct views and lively affections; even as the Spirit suggested divine truths to their minds, and enabled them to discourse upon them in a suitable manner. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) A more stupendous miracle than this can scarcely be imagined; as every one must perceive, who carefully considers the subject; and recollects with what difficulty an adult person acquires the accurate knowledge and pronunciation even of one language, so as to speak it with propriety, and without hesitation. At the same time, it was of the utmost importance to the end designed: for, while it served to confirm the testimony of the witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, it qualified the apostles and first preachers of the gospel for their important service, to which their want of learning would have otherwise been an insurmountable hindrance.—The diversity of languages introduced by the power of God, as a judgment on the presumptuous and rebellious builders at Babel, has always been the great obstacle to the diffusion of useful knowledge, and of true religion. (Notes, Gen. xi. 1—9. Is. xxv. 6—8.) The persons therefore whom the Lord saw good to employ in propagating the Christian religion among the nations, and who were unacquainted with foreign languages, could have made no progress in their work, without this special gift, or something equivalent to it: for even the Jews dispersed in foreign countries generally spoke the Greek tongue. But, the deficiency being supplied in this miraculous manner, enabled them to shew the credentials of their commission from God, along with their ability for the service to which they were called, in every place whither they went.—'As the confusion of tongues in Babel spread idolatry throughout the world, and made men lose the knowledge of God and true religion; so God provided, by the gift of tongues in Zion, to repair the knowledge of himself among the nations.' Whitby.

V. 5. Numbers of Jews and proselytes, at that time, were collected in Jerusalem, who had come up to celebrate the feast: (Note, 1:) and many took up their residence there more permanently, in order to attend on the worship at the temple, to which they had a devoted affection; and for education and religious instruction. (Note, vi. 9—14, v. 9.)—The phrase, "every nation under heaven," is no doubt hyperbolical; and refers to all those nations, among which the people of Israel had been scattered. (Marg.

When “this voice was made,” (marg.) or, when these extraordinary events were reported abroad; the multitudes came together to the place; and after they had examined the matter, they were thrown into the utmost astonishment, by hearing the apostles and disciples, one after another, address them severally in their own languages. For they understood, either by previous information, or by some circumstances respecting them, that they were all natives of Galilee, persons of mean education and employment, who could not be expected to know any other language, than the dialect of the Hebrew, or the Syriack, which was there generally used: yet they addressed themselves to every one of the company, in that language, which was peculiar to his native country; the same persons also speaking to several of them in succession, in different languages, without the least hesitation or inaccuracy. (Marg. Ref. p—r.)—From the different regions afterwards mentioned, it is computed, that seven or eight distinct languages, and many more different dialects of the same language, must have been thus spoken, that each of this company might hear his native tongue. (*Marg. V. 12, 13. The strangers, who perfectly understood the words of the disciples, were fully satisfied of the reality of the miracle; though they were in doubt, and great perplexity, as to the meaning and intention of it; but others derided them as a company of drunkards, who, having drunk too freely of the “new” wine prepared for the feast, uttered unmeaning sounds in a confused and clamorous manner, as if they were speaking in other languages. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, that these were the inhabitants of Judea, who understood no language except their own; and were more prejudiced against Jesus, than those who came from a distance were: yet some of these observed, that the Galileans were no longer distinguishable by their peculiar pronunciation (9).

several hearers best understood: though the substance of his discourse only is recorded for our instruction. He lifted up his voice, and spake with such boldness, and in so audible a manner, that he silenced the mixed conversation, and fixed the attention of the people. He addressed himself especially to the men of Judca, and those who more stately sojourned at Jerusalem; and no doubt he spake in the Hebrew or Syriack tongue: and he demanded their serious regard to the highly interesting subject, about which he was about to discourse. He observed, that the opinion, of the company being drunken, was totally groundless, as many present must know: and, as it was no more than "the third hour of the day," or nine o'clock in the morning according to our reckoning, it was very uncandid, to suppose that so many persons had been guilty of excess, on a solemn religious festival, when about to attend on the worship at the temple. (Marg. Ref. o-t.) On the contrary, the effects which they witnessed were a fulfilment of a remarkable prophecy of Joel, concerning the pouring out of the Holy Spirit in the last days of the nation, or in those of the Messial. (Marg. Ref. y-b.) This prediction has already been explained. (Notes, Joel ii. 28-32.) It may here be observed, that the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was no more than the beginning of the accomplishment of this prophecy: nor could Peter himself then understand the full meaning of it; for it related to "all flesh," to men of all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, as it was afterwards verified in the different Christian churches.—The word, "prophesy," may denote, not only the fluency of the persons in speaking of divine things, for the instruction of others, as the term is sometimes used; but also their predicting future events, especially those concerning the approaching ruin of the unbelieving Jewish nation: for "the wonders," afterwards mentioned, evidently relate to the prodigies, which preceded and attended the destruction of Jerusalem, and the subsequent devastations; as these were, in some respects, typical of the terrors and solemnities connected with the end of the world and the day of judgment. (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 29-51.) Whether or not we here understand, by "calling on the name of the LORD," an application to the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation, as in a parallel passage; (Marg. Ref. f.—Note, Rom. x. 12-17;) the apostle certainly meant to warn the Jews, that none of their prayers would be heard, for deliverance from the approaching miseries, if they continued to reject their promised Messiah, whose coming, resurrection, and exaltation were attested to them by these miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit: and the connexion of the words implies the same warning to all who read them, in respect of deliverance "from the wrath to come."

The quotation, though in general made in the words of the Septuagint, varies from that version, and from the Hebrew text, in nearly the same particulars. Instead of "afterward," or "after these things," we here read, "in the last days;" the order of the clauses in the seventeenth verse is changed; "and they shall prophesy," at the end of the eighteenth is added; as is "above," and "beneath," in the nineteenth. The Septuagint has "notable," or illustrious, (επιφανής;) instead of terrible, (from τηρ, instead of σπ;) which is here retained.—The conclusion of the prophecy is omitted.

V. 22-24. The apostle, in connexion with this prophecy of Joel, and its astonishing fulfilment before their eyes, called the attention of his audience more immediately to the grand subject of his discourse. They all had heard or known many things concerning Jesus, who had been despised as "a Nazarene:" yet it was evident, that

God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know : 23 Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain;

24 Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.

25 For David speaketh concerning

he was a man, whom God had greatly owned and approved. This appeared from the various, multiplied, and incontestable miracles, which were wrought by him among them, in the most publick manner, as they well knew. (Marg. Ref. g—k.) Yet, instead of receiving him as the Son of God, and the Messiah, their rulers had taken him up and condemned him as a malefactor; and so had crucified him "by the hands of the wicked," that is, the hands of the idolatrous Romans: and, as the multitude of the nation had preferred Barabbas to him, and clamorously demanded his crucifixion; this most atrocious murder was become their own act and deed, as much as if they had performed it with their own hands. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 19—25.)—Indeed all this had been done, "according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God;" who had decreed this great event for the most wise, righteous, and merciful purposes; and had also predicted it many ages before: yet that was in no degree an excuse for their guilt, or an extenuation of it; as they were influenced by the basest motives in what they did, and "by wicked hands had crucified and slain him." (Marg. Ref. l, m.)—But, though they had murdered this Jesus, as if he had been "a deceiver," God had abundantly vindicated his character and claim, as the promised Messiah; having raised him up, and liberated him from "the bonds of death," or from those bonds, in which the pains and agonies of his cruel execution had terminated; (Note, Is. liii. 9—12;) by which indeed it was impossible that he should be long confined; whether the dignity of his Person, the nature of his undertaking, the perfection of his work, the purpose of God, or the predictions of scripture were considered. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, John ii. 18—22. x. 14—18.)—Delivered by, &c. (23) 'Him, being permitted by God to fall into your hands, God having withdrawn that protection, which was necessary to have preserved him from them; (and this by his decree, that he should lay down his life for his sheep, in order to that great design of man's salvation, toward which he did by his foreknowledge discern this the fittest expedient;) ye apprehended and crucified most wickedly.' Hammoud. 'In scripture, that is said to be done by "the determinate counsel of God," which is done according to what he had written and declared in his word, all predictions concerning things future, being declarations, and determinations that they shall come to pass. 'doth suppose, that God can foresee and foretel, what 'man, not hindered by him, but left to his own inclinations, will do. And if that foresight hath any influence 'on the will, to make the action necessary, then ... all our 'actions must be necessary.' Whilby. Did this learned writer suppose, that, according to the doctrine of Calvinists, the foresight, or even the decree, of God has any influence on the will or free agency of man? If either he, or others, who have brought the same objections, suppose this, they are very blameably ignorant of the doctrine which they would confute.—'God foresees and foretels, what man left 'to his inclinations will do;' and God determines to leave him to his inclinations. The permission is enough in such a case: but to determine, by preventing grace, to make the sinner willing to submit, believe, and obey, requires a positive interposition of a divine and new creating power; which none deserves, or, left entirely to himself, desires, and which God bestows or withholds, "according to the counsel of his own will."—Again, such texts constrain both the above cited learned writers to allow, that the event was certainly foreseen, and could not but take place; though the persons concerned were under no coercion, and acted according to the lusts of their own hearts. But did God certainly foresee this, as his own all-wise determination and decree; or as something independent on his decree, which could neither be altered nor prevented? (Notes, iv. 23—28, v. 28. Matt. xxvi. 21—24. Luke xxii. 21—23.)

a passage, with which the Jews were well acquainted. (Marg. Ref. q—b.—Note, Ps. xvi. 8—11.) This, the apostle stated, would be rendered manifest unto them, if they would permit him to speak freely of David, who was one of the venerable patriarchs of their nation, being the progenitor of that numerous and honourable family, from whom the Messiah was to descend: for it was evident, that David “died, was buried, and saw corruption,” like other men; and his sepulchre had been preserved, by frequent repairs, even to that day, in honour of his memory. It therefore followed beyond all controversy that he spake not of himself, in the passage which had been cited; but, being a prophet, and knowing that the Messiah would descend from him, in respect of his human nature, to reign upon his throne over the people of God for ever; (Note, Rom. i. 1—4. ix. 4, 5;) in the prospect of these events, “he spake of the resurrection of the Messiah,” who was indeed to be put to death, but whose soul would not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor would his body be suffered to lie in the grave, till it began in the least to corrupt. In accomplishment of this prophecy God had actually raised up Jesus, whom the Jews had crucified; but who was indeed the promised Messiah, of the family of David, and born at Bethlehem. This event had taken place on the third day after his death, before the body had begun “to see corruption;” (Lev. vii. 17;) of this the twelve apostles and all the company present were competent witnesses, as they had seen and conversed with him repeatedly after his resurrection. V. 33—36. The resurrection of Jesus did not rest solely on the testimony of the apostles, and the other disciples. (Note, John xx. 24—29.) For, having ascended into heaven, he had been exalted by the power of God, at his right hand, to the highest possible dignity and authority: and, having received, from God the Father, the Holy Spirit, according to the promises of the scripture to the Messiah, he had poured out upon his disciples all those miraculous gifts and divine influences, the effects of which were witnessed at that time, and which could not possibly be accounted for in any other manner. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, Is. xlv. 3—5. lix. 20, 21. lxi. 1—3. Eph. i. 15—23. iv. 7—10. Heb. i. 3, 4. xii. 2, 3.) For David had not arisen from the dead to ascend into heaven, according to the meaning of the Psalm before cited: but in another place, calling the promised Messiah his Lord, though he was to be his Son; he had predicted his ascension into heaven, and his exaltation to the right hand of God; there to be established in supreme authority, till he had subjected all his enemies, and rendered their opposition to him an accession to his own glory. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, Ps. cx. 1. Matt. xxii. 41—46. 1 Cor. xv. 20—28. Eph. iv. 11—13.) As therefore the events which the apostles testified, and to which the Holy Spirit poured out upon them also bore witness, accorded so exactly to their ancient prophecies; the whole house of Israel might be assured, by the most complete demonstration imaginable, that God had constituted Jesus of Nazareth, whom

When the Jews were convinced of this, and were induced to believe on him in that character; they would readily learn from scripture, and from further instructions, the spiritual nature of his kingdom and salvation, the intent of his sufferings and death, and the various doctrines of his religion.

V. 37—40. The apostle's arguments were invincibly conclusive, and his application most highly interesting; though in other respects his discourse was peculiarly plain and simple. But if we duly consider the complicated evidence of our Lord's doctrine and miracles, and the obstinate unbelief of the Jews notwithstanding; we shall perceive, that neither Peter's words, nor yet the miracles which the people witnessed, would have produced those effects which followed, had not the Holy Spirit also been communicated, to remove the veil of pride, prejudice, and sinful affections from their minds. "The Comforter being come, he convinced them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." (Note, John xvi. 8—11.) The apostle's words, therefore, attended by the powerful convictions of the Holy Spirit, penetrated their hearts like arrows, or as a sharp sword; and, being filled with terror on account of their enormous guilt, in rejecting and "crucifying the Lord of glory," they cried out to the apostles in deep distress, as to their friends and countrymen, enquiring with great earnestness, "What must we do?" Was there any hope for them of escaping the vengeance of their exalted Messiah, whom they had so deeply injured? If there were, by what means could it be done? (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, ix. 3—6. xvi. 29—34. Matt. vii. 24—27.) To this the apostle replied, by exhorting them to repent of that, and all their other sins; (Note, Matt. iii. 2;) and openly to avow their firm belief, that Jesus was indeed the Messiah, by being baptized in his name. (Marg. Ref. r. x—z.—Note, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Mark xvi. 14—16.) In remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.

39 For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.

40 And with many other words

thus professing their faith in him, all who truly believed would receive a full remission of their sins for his sake; as well as a participation of the sanctifying and comforting graces of the Holy Spirit, and many of them likewise of those miraculous powers, which they saw bestowed upon his disciples. (Note, xxii. 14—16.) For "the promise," both the general promise respecting the Messiah, and the blessings of his kingdom, as made to Abraham their father, (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. xvii. 7, 8,) and the particular promise of the Spirit quoted from Joel; (16—21;) was made, or proposed, "to them and to their children;" and not to those present only, but to all, however dispersed, whom God should call by his gospel. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) Peter's words, as suggested by the Holy Spirit, implied the calling of the Gentiles also; yet he could not himself at this time understand them in that sense. (Notes, i. 4—8. iii. 19—21. x. 9—16.)—The promise, as made to Abraham, included also his posterity; and that of the new covenant did the same to those who should be interested in it; and the language here accords with this. (Notes, Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Rom. xi. 11—21. 1 Cor. vii. 10—14.) The male descendants of Abraham were circumcised, as included in the promise, and as a part of the visible church; and this passage may intimate, that the infant-offspring of Christians, being also included in the promise, and in the covenant of their parents, and being a part of the visible church, should be admitted to baptism, which is the outward sign of the same spiritual blessings, as circumcision was. (Note, Gen. xvii. 9—12.)—Besides this general address, Peter bore witness to the truth, and in the name of God charged his audience, with very many other words: the substance of which was, that they ought to embrace the gospel, without waiting for the concurrence of their rulers and teachers, or the rest of the people; (Note, Luke xii. 54—57;) and, by thus entering into the church and kingdom of Christ, should save themselves from the destruction which impended over that perverse and rebellious generation of Israel, for obstinately rejecting the promised Messiah; as well as that they should "flee for refuge" to Jesus, "from the wrath to come." (Marg. Ref. c—h.—Notes, Heb. vi. 13—20.)

V. 41. The apostle had exhorted "every one" of them to be baptized; and "those who gladly received the word" were baptized. As therefore it is highly improbable, that there should have been none of John's disciples in this large company; we may fairly infer, that Christ's baptism was not precisely the same institution with John's; and that from this time, at least, John's disciples were baptized, when they were admitted into the Christian church, according to the form appointed by our Lord after his resurrection. (Notes, xix. 5, 6. Matt. iii. 5, 6. xxviii. 19, 20. John iii. 22—24.)—Peter exhorted the Jews to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, as professing their faith in him, the Messiah; yet there is no reason to doubt that they were baptized, "in," or "into, the name of the "Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," according to the appointed form.—As so great a number were baptized on this occasion, and as they were not by the river Jordan "where was much water," or near to any other river; but in the midst of a populous city, crowded also with strangers, it is at least highly probable, that they were not baptized by immersion: especially seeing the baptism of the Holy Ghost, represented by it, is constantly, and in several places of the chapter, spoken of, as "poured "out" upon them. (See on 33.)—The numerous converts made on this occasion, though at first "pricked to "the heart," are said to have "gladly received" Peter's word. They were deeply convinced of their guilt and danger; and they rejoiced to hear of a free forgiveness, through that Saviour whom they had concurred in crucifying: so that they cheerfully ventured all the consequences of embracing the gospel, and joining themselves, by baptism, to the despised and persecuted disciples of Jesus. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, xvi. 29—34. John xvi. 8—11. 14, 15. Rom. x. 5—11.)

V. 42, 43. The conversion of this great multitude was sudden; yet their profession was not transient or wavering: for they stedfastly attended on the instructions of the apostles, and adhered to their doctrine, though doubtless many efforts would be made to draw them aside, by reasoning, ridiculing, menacing, or affecting to pity them, as deluded enthusiasts. They also associated with the apostles and disciples in religious conference and worship, joining with them in "breaking of bread," as well as in prayers. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) This seems to refer to the administration of the Lord's supper, in remembrance of the atoning sufferings and death of Christ; which evidently took place very frequently in the primitive times. (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 14—17. xi. 17—28.)—The impression also, which these transactions made upon the spectators and all who heard of them, was very great: for all the people were overawed, and afraid of attempting any thing against the disciples; as they saw evident and signal miracles wrought by the apostles, in confirmation of the resurrection and power of the crucified Jesus. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Note, v. 12—16.)

V. 44—47. Many of the converts were strangers, who probably were detained at Jerusalem longer than they had intended, in order to get a further insight into the religion which they had embraced; and others were poor: the more affluent therefore of the company were contented to share their abundance, in common with their poorer brethren. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, iv. 32—37. Gal. vi. 1—5.) This was a remarkable evidence of their indifference about the world; of their joy and confidence in the Lord; in his providential care, as well as in his mercy and grace; of their love and gratitude to him, and of their cordial affection to one another, though just before they had been strangers, and divided from each other. (Notes, x. 9—16. Is. xi. 6—9. lxxv. 24, 25.) Perhaps the predictions which they had heard concerning the approaching desolations of Jerusalem and Judea, might concur in influencing them to sell their estates and possessions, that they might impart to every one of the company, as each had need. (Note, 14—21.) This was peculiarly suitable to the state of the church at that time, and the same disposition ought always to prevail: yet it is evident, that the same way of expressing it is not required, nor would it be in general expedient. (P. O. Matt. xxvi. 1—13. 2 Cor. viii. 10—15.) Indeed, it was done at this time, not by command or constraint, but voluntarily. (Note, v. 1—11, v. 4.)—The minds of the new converts were occupied almost entirely with the important concerns of eternal salvation: and as numbers of them were far from home, and probably had not many secular affairs to attend on; they daily continued in the most harmonious manner, to meet together in the courts of the temple for the worship of God, and in the houses of believers, one after another, as they had opportunity; where they hospitably entertained each other, as well as joined in sacred ordinances. (Note, Prov. viii. 34.) Thus their very meals were sanctified; as they used the good gifts of God with cheerful gratitude, and in a simple dependence on him, and desire to please him.—They were also greatly occupied in celebrating the praises of God, and blessing him for all his unspeakable benefits: so that even the Jews, who did not join them, held them in great estimation, and shewed great favour to them. (Note, iv. 32—35.)—What a lovely exhibition of the effects of genuine Christianity, when applied and blessed by the Spirit of God! What excellent and what happy characters does it form!—Thus the Lord, from day to day, inclined the hearts of more and more, to embrace the gospel, and join themselves to the disciples of Jesus: and they did not merely profess to be disciples, but were actually brought into a state of acceptance with God, as penitent believers in Christ. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Delays as to the performance of God's promises, till the appointed time is "fully come," are peculiarly advantageous to those, who wait on him in patient faith and fervent persevering prayer. When a company of believers are "of one heart," thus to seek and hope for "the pouring out of his Holy Spirit," a revival of true religion may reasonably, nay confidently, be expected: for the promise stands sure, that "our heavenly Father will give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him." (Notes, Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Luke xi. 5—13, v. 13.)—We cannot explain the manner of his operation; but we may perceive, that with invincible power he bears down all the opposition of pride and worldly lusts and prejudices, as "with a rushing mighty wind;" and changes the heart like a vehement fire. Sound judgment, heavenly wisdom and knowledge, fervent affections, holy boldness, and a ready utterance in the things of God, are his gifts to those whom he qualifies for the sacred ministry, or to serve the church of Christ in any important publick situation; for which all ought simply to depend on him, according to their need. We do not expect such miraculous powers, as were communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost; yet we share the benefit of them; both in the demonstrative evidence thus given to the truth of the gospel, and in the infallible declaration, which they have authenticated and transmitted to us, concerning the way in which we may be saved.—The remarkable pouring out of the Spirit, even in his ordinary influences and operations, will always produce a measure of the same effects, as this extraordinary communication did. (Note, Is. xxxii. 15.) It will soon be "noised abroad;" many will be excited to examine into it, and to make their observations; many will be astonished at the change wrought in such persons, as were before known to be careless, ignorant, or illiterate, and at the things spoken by them; and they will be led to acknowledge, that there is something real and wonderful in it: others will stand in doubt, and not know what to determine about it: nay, some, more ignorant, self-important, malignant, and daring, will, without hesitation or competent information, even pronounce the whole enthusiasm, delusion, hypocrisy, imposture, or perhaps intoxication, and so treat it with scorn and derision! "But wisdom is justified by all her children." (P. O. Matt. xii. 22—30.)

V. 14—21.

If we are indeed influenced by the Spirit of truth, holiness, and love, we shall meekly bear, or reply to, the most injurious reflections; assigning the cause of those effects, which excite many and discordant opinions. Thus, even curiosity and malicious reproaches will give the ministers of Christ an opportunity of bearing testimony to the truth, before those who have been strangers and enemies to it. On such occasions, it is peculiarly important for us to shew the agreement of our sentiments, mind, heart, and conduct, with the doctrines, promises, predictions, examples, and precepts of scripture; clearly and strongly arguing from the sacred word, as undoubted truth; and applying every subject, as cogently as possible, to the hearts and consciences of our hearers.—To suppose, however, that, now Christianity is publicly professed among us, and we have no longer need of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, we therefore do not want his sanctifying operations; is as unreasonable, as it would be to argue from the present improved state of agriculture, that the influences of the sun and rain are become unnecessary: and the state of those congregations, where such notions are maintained, too plainly shew the real tendency

God had thus fulfilled the scriptures, 17, 18; he exhorts them to "repent and be converted, that their sins" may be pardoned, and they made partakers of the promised blessing, 19, 20; and refers them to

Moses and all the prophets, whose predictions were fulfilled in Jesus the Saviour, whom God had sent to bless them, in turning them from their iniquities, 21—26.

of them. If Peter and Paul should come again on earth to preach the gospel, and to confirm their doctrine with the most undeniable miracles; no saving effects would follow, except the Holy Spirit were given to render the word successful. But, in fact, the whole gospel will seldom, if ever, be faithfully preached, with earnest and faithful application to the heart and conscience; except when the minister is in some good measure enabled to speak, as "the Spirit gives him utterance." Even Peter and the other apostles were manifestly raised above themselves, when thus "filled with the Holy Ghost;" and their singular boldness and liberty, in discoursing concerning the wonderful works of God, as evidently proved that they were supernaturally aided, as the new tongues with which they spake. (Note, Mark xvi. 17, 18.) Such assistance we may expect, and shall experience, from time to time, when called to bear witness to "the truth as it is in Jesus."—It should also be noticed, as the evident doctrine of the sacred oracles, that when God so remarkably pours out his Spirit, in abundance of spiritual gifts and graces, on numbers of every rank and station, as to effect a great revival of true religion; it may also be expected, that he will remarkably punish those, who persist in neglecting and despising his great salvation. Assuredly, at that solemn period which is so often foretold, and prefigured in scripture; when "the sun shall" literally "be turned into darkness," and the whole visible creation be destroyed by one common conflagration, to introduce "the great and notable day" of "judgment, and perdition of ungodly men;" none will escape that dreadful condemnation, and the subsequent vengeance, except those who have previously called upon the name of the Lord, in and through his Son Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour of sinners and the Judge of mankind. But, on the other hand, whosoever of any age, nation, rank, or character, now calls on the name of the Lord, in this appointed manner, shall then be completely saved, and made an heir of eternal life:

V. 22—36.

The enmity of the human heart against God appears especially in the scornful hatred, generally manifested against those whom he has most evidently owned and approved. The doctrine, miracles, character, and crucifixion of Jesus form the chief proof of this: but instances confirming and illustrating the same conclusion have been multiplied in every age.—The "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" cannot be the motive of men's actions, being wholly unknown by them, or unthought of at the time; and therefore can form no excuse for their sins. In permitting ungodly men to follow their own inclinations, God brings to pass those events, which he has purposed and predicted: but his decrees, and their accomplishment, are most holy, wise, righteous, and good; whereas the instruments by which he works are actuated by the basest motives, and aim at the gratification of their worst passions. (Notes, Gen. i. 20. Is. x. 5—7.) This was most evident in the crucifixion of Christ; which, "as

"appointed of God," was the most glorious display of all the divine perfections, and replete with the richest blessings to mankind; but, as perpetrated by the Jews, it was the grand discovery of human depravity, and in all its circumstances, the greatest single act of wickedness, which ever was or can be committed. Men of this character aim to counteract the purposes of God, at the very time when they are accomplishing them: and when he has wrought by them, as long as he sees good, he turns his hand against them to their destruction.—As it was "not possible," that the Redeemer should be held under the power of death, though he endured the pain of it; so it cannot be, that the scripture should be broken, or that his believing people should come short of that blessed resurrection, of which he was the glorious First-fruits. After his example they are taught to "set God always before them," to walk as in his presence in humble obedience, and in confidence that they "shall not be moved." In proportion to the degree of their faith and hope, their hearts rejoice and dictate praises to their tongues.—They too learn to meet death with a comfortable hope, that, though "their flesh see corruption" in the grave, yet it shall not finally be left there, and that their souls shall never experience the miseries of the place of torment. Through their crucified, risen, and ascended Saviour, "the ways of life" are made known to them also; and, from present earnestness, they are encouraged to expect, that they shall be filled with the joy of God's presence and favour for evermore. (P. O. Ps. xvi.) But all this springs from their assured belief, grounded on prophecies, miracles, and abundant external and internal proofs, and the effectual teaching of the Holy Spirit, by these proofs, that Jesus is indeed ascended into the heavens. Pious kings, patriarchs, and prophets of old looked forward to these events with joyful expectation; and died assuredly believing that the Redeemer would appear to overcome death, and to open the gates of heaven to all that trusted in him. An innumerable company of witnesses testify, that the crucified Jesus was he; and that, being risen from the dead, "he is exalted by the hand of the Father," to communicate all blessings to his people, and to put all his enemies under his feet. Therefore "let all men know assuredly," that Jesus is the Lord and Judge of the whole world, and the anointed Saviour of all who obey him. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 16, 17. Luke x. 23, 24. Heb. xi. 13—16. 1 Pet. i. 10—12.)

V. 37—41.

When the solemn truths of scripture are declared, with plain and direct application to the conscience, attended by the convincing Spirit of God, the proud, stout, and hard heart begins to tremble and be disquieted: nor will the salvation and kingdom of "the Prince of peace" ever be welcome to those, who never were "pricked to the heart," by humiliating convictions of sin, (generally accompanied with alarm also,) so as to be excited to earnest enquiries, "What shall we do?" (Note, Zech. xii. 9—14, v. 10.) But the most desperate enemies, when thus awakened, should be exhorted to repent, and believe in Jesus, and to prove and profess their faith, in the way prescribed by his holy word. Still repentance and remission of sins are preached to "the chief of sinners," in the Redeemer's name: still the Holy Spirit seals the blessing on the believer's heart: still the encouraging "promises are to us, and to our children;" who possess manifold advantages and opportunities, through the faith and obedience of their parents: still the same blessings are sent to "all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." We should therefore embrace this salvation ourselves: and then, as we have opportunity, and as we are able, we should testify, warn, exhort, invite, and persuade sinners to save themselves from the perverse and crooked generation of those who reject the gospel. But if our teachers and rulers, or a large majority of our neighbours, nay, even if our nearest relatives refuse to go with us in the way to heaven, or would hinder us from going; we must stop our ears to their blandishments, persuasions, reproaches, and persecuting opposition, and escape for our lives from the ruin impending over them.—Under the teaching of the Holy Spirit convinced sinners "gladly receive the word" of salvation, and find "peace and joy in believing;" they boldly profess the truth which before they despised, renouncing worldly interests, pleasures, and companions; and, joining themselves to the Lord and his people, they delight in attending on his ordinances and in keeping his commandments.

V. 42—47.

When shall we behold the whole company of those, who have been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, disposed to copy the example of these first-fruits of the gospel? This specimen of the genuine nature and tendency of Christianity ought carefully to be studied: for unless our views, pursuits, affections, and conduct, in good measure correspond with their's, we have great reason to question whether we be truly believers. Indeed hasty conversions, from one creed or sect to another, are seldom followed by such a steadfastness in faith and practice, "as becomes the gospel of Christ:" yet these things have been, and will again be united; and we must therefore form no general rules without allowing for exceptions.

Rather let us diligently copy the pattern here exhibited, and pray without ceasing for the "pouring out of the Spirit," to produce these blessed effects in us and around us: that we too may "continue stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine," and "in fellowship" with all true believers; that our attendance on the Lord's table may be more frequent, serious, and influential, than it generally is at present; that we may abound more in social prayers and supplications for each other, and for the success of the gospel; that we may delight daily in attending to the word of God, when we have opportunity, and leisure from other duties; that we may "use hospitality without grudging," and communicate liberally to our needy brethren; and that "whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do all to the glory of God," "in gladness and singleness of heart," at a distance from avarice, selfishness, intemperance, pride, envy, contention, or any of those manifold evils, which corrupt, disgrace, and divide the church of Christ. Thus we shall over-awe our inveterate enemies, even without the power of working miracles: thus we shall "shew forth the praises of him, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light;" silence the slanders, and soften the prejudices, of those who are without; and dispose them to favour us, and attend to "the doctrine of God our Saviour." And when the most unlikely persons, (such as the crucifiers of the Lord Jesus,) are transformed by the gospel into harmless, peaceful, loving, and exemplary worshippers and servants of God, it may be expected, that "the Lord will add to his church daily such as shall be saved."—Even those who, like Peter, have been overcome by temptation, to act inconsistently with their holy profession; if indeed they are deeply humbled, and made more bold and zealous for the cause of their gracious Lord; may yet hope to be employed as his instruments in forwarding so blessed a work, for his glory and the salvation of souls. May the Lord then pour out his Holy Spirit on all ministers, Christians, and congregations for these blessed purposes, till "the earth be filled with the knowledge of his glory!" Amen! and Amen.

same doctrine, had already been performed among them. Or why did they look to him and John, as if they had healed the man by their own power; or as if their own "holiness," or godliness, had given them some peculiar interest in the favour of God? (Marg. Ref. z, a.) For this was by no means the case: on the contrary, "the God of their fathers" had wrought this, and all the other wonders which they had witnessed, in order to honour his Son Jesus, "whom he had glorified" at his right hand in heaven. Indeed they had delivered Jesus as a condemned malefactor to Pilate, "because he called himself the Son of God;" rejecting their promised Messiah, and prevailing with Pilate by importunity to crucify him, when, convinced of his innocence, he "had determined to release him." Nay, at the same time that they thus unanimously and deliberately renounced this righteous Saviour, this "holy One of God;" they had desired the release of a murderer. (Marg. Ref. b—f.—Notes, ii. 33—36. Matt. xxvii. 19—26. Mark xv. 6—10. Luke xxiii. 13—25.) Thus, they had wickedly preferred a wretch who destroyed men's lives, to "the Prince of life;" the Author of life and salvation, from whom alone spiritual and eternal life could be obtained; and they had murdered him by the hands of the Gentiles! But though they had thus atrociously dishonoured the Author of life: (Note, John i. 4, 5. v. 24—27. xi. 20—27. xiv. 4—6. Col. iii. 1—4. 1 John i. 1, 2. v. 11, 12:) yet God his Father had raised him from the dead, of which they were witnesses: and the incontestable miracle, which excited their amazement, had been performed by faith in the name of Jesus, and by power derived from him, in confirmation of their testimony to his resurrection and ascension: nor had they done any thing in restoring this cripple to "perfect soundness," except as their faith had relied on the power of Jesus to perform the cure. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g—l.—Holiness. (12) 'Here is a plain evidence of the variation of the Roman doctrine, from that of the apostles, assisted by the Holy Ghost: for the apostles here plainly disclaim any excellency or piety in them, which might make them worthy to be God's instruments, above any others, in working such miracles; but the catechism of the council of Trent plainly declares, that God confers on us many benefits by the merits of the saints; and Lorinus, on the place, declares, that innumerable histories, and the practice of the church, show that the merits of the saints are prevalent for the working of miracles.' Whitby.—Through faith, &c.) Some expositors interpret this of the faith, which the lame man exercised in the name of Jesus; and the probability that he had heard and seen Christ himself, as well as the piety which apparently accompanied his gratitude to Peter and John for his cure, favours the opinion that he was a believer. Yet it does not appear that he previously expected a cure; and the texts referred to, will, I think, convince the attentive reader, that the faith of the apostles was intended. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Matt. xxi. 21, 22. Mark xi. 20—26.) They had used the name of Jesus in faith; and a divine power had, in answer to their expectations, "given perfect

"soundness" to one, who had been a cripple from his birth, who was forty years of age, and who was well known to the people. This was designed to shew, that Jesus was risen; that he was indeed the Messiah, and as such honoured by the God of Abraham; and that the apostles were his servants and witnesses.—Every reflecting person must observe the very great difference, which there was in the manner of our Lord's working his miracles, and that of his apostles. His language was that of omnipotence and sovereignty, "I will, be thou clean:" "Peace, be still:" "Damsel, arise." Nor did he ever, except in the case of Lazarus, which has been considered, (Notes, John xi. 41—46, v. 41, 42,) even appeal by prayer to his Father, or give the least intimation of any power exerted, except what was inherent in himself. He never hesitated to receive the greatest honour, which was rendered on these occasions; he never cautioned any man against supposing that he wrought miracles by "his own power, and to manifest his own glory." (Note, John ii. 6—11, v. 11.) But the apostles wrought their miracles expressly "in his name," and by faith in him: they were afraid of receiving any honour to themselves, except as the undeserving instruments in the hands of Jesus: they referred all the honour to their Lord: and they never mentioned the Father; except to shew, that the God of Abraham was fulfilling in "his Son Jesus," the promises made to the patriarchs, and was determined to glorify in every way that Person, whom the Jews had treated with contempt and indignity. No satisfactory reason ever was, or ever can be, given of this manifest difference; but by allowing that Jesus knew himself to be "One with the Father" and equal to him; and that the apostles were conscious, that they were weak and sinful men, who depended on Jesus alone for every thing.—His name, &c.] His power accompanying the use of "his name," with "faith in his name:" even "the faith that is by him," effected the cure. V. 17, 18. The apostle, having shewn the Jews the atrociousness of their crime, was careful not to irritate them needlessly, nor yet to drive them to despair. He was willing candidly to suppose, that both they and their rulers had done this deed in ignorance. This ignorance indeed resulted from pride, prejudice, and many criminal sources; yet "they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, if they had known him." (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Luke xxiii. 32—38, v. 34. John xix. 8—12. 1 Cor. ii. 6—9. 1 Tim. i. 12—14. Heb. vi. 4—6.) God had, however, in this manner fulfilled the prophecies of the scripture, concerning the atoning sufferings of their promised Messiah: so that, though "they had thought evil against him, yet God meant it for good."—"Though the ignorance of the whole nation, and especially of the rulers in this case, was such as took away all just excuse in them, on account of their infidelity; (John xv. 22—24;) yet, because it was occasioned by those prejudices which they had contracted, through the meanness of his character, and their imagination that Christ should not die, and that his kingdom should be temporal, Christ bears with it, till the time of the effusion of the Holy Ghost; and then calls them again by his apostles to repentance." Whitby. (Note, Matt. xii. 31, 32.)—I wot, &c. (17) Marg. Ref. m. Before had shewed. (18) Προκαθηγγειλε. 24. vii. 52. 2 Cor. iv. 25. Not elsewhere.

V. 19—21. As the sin of the Jews was so undeniable and aggravated, and as there was yet hope for them in the mercy of God, through the Saviour whom they had crucified; the apostle exhorted them to repent, and turn from that, and all their other sins, to the acceptable worship and service of God, by faith in his Son. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, xvii. 30, 31. xx. 18—21. xxvi. 19—23. Ez. xviii. 30—32. Matt. iii. 2. Luke xiii. 1—5. xxiv. 44—49.) Thus, and thus only, all their sins would be blotted out as a cancelled debt, never more to be charged to their account. (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Ps. li. 1, 2. 9. Is. xliii. 22—25. xlv. 22.)—The following words may be rendered, perhaps more clearly, "That seasons of refreshment may come from the presence of the Lord; and that he may send Jesus Christ, who hath before been preached unto you, &c."—"Divine refreshment would no doubt immediately mingle itself with the sense of pardon, and eternal happiness would at length certainly succeed. But the following clause seems to intimate, that Peter apprehended that the conversion of the Jews, as a people, would be attended with some extraordinary scene of prosperity and

'joy, and open a speedy way to Christ's descent from heaven, in order to "the restitution of all things."—I find 'that the learned Vitringa agrees with me in this interpretation.' Doddridge. The prophets in general predicted, not only glorious times to the church under the reign of the Messiah, but to the nation of Israel when converted to him. (Marg. Ref. y.) That nation had long been harassed and oppressed in various ways, and was at the time when Peter spoke, under the Roman yoke, which was extremely galling; and the wickedness of the rulers and people, in crucifying the Messiah, might seem to have filled up the measure of their national guilt, and ripened them for destruction. But as Jesus, after his resurrection, had directed his apostles to "preach repentance and remission of sins in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;" (Note, Luke xxiv. 44—49, v. 47;) and as the success of their first attempt had been so signal, and they had hitherto met with no opposition; it is probable, they expected that Christ would soon "restore the kingdom to Israel," having first brought the nation in general to repent and believe in him; (Note, i. 4—8;) and would afterwards, by their means, bring the other nations to embrace the religion of Israel, and so, as proselytes, to seek admission into the kingdom of the Messiah. Then, perhaps, they expected that Jesus would return again from heaven, set up a triumphant kingdom on earth; and, destroying all obstinate enemies, would introduce those glorious days, which all the prophets had foretold.—It is undeniable, that the apostles, for a considerable time after the day of Pentecost, did not clearly understand many things, relating to the calling of the Gentiles, the rejection of the Jews, and the fulfilment of the prophecies. (Notes, ii. 14—21. x. 9—16. 44—48. xi. 1—18. xv. 1—21. Matt. xxiv. 3.) Their minds were enlightened, and their prejudices dissipated; rapidly indeed, yet gradually, and as their present circumstances and duties required. Thus the ancient prophets were inspired to foretel as much, as it was proper should at the time be known; yet they did not immediately, or certainly, know the meaning of their own predictions; (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12;) and the apostles and primitive Christians after the event understood them far more clearly, than the prophets themselves had done. In like manner, after the conversion of Cornelius, and the council at Jerusalem, Christians in general would understand St. Peter's words, concerning the "pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh," more distinctly than he did when he uttered them; and after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the abolishing of the Mosaic dispensation, the surviving Christians would more exactly perceive the meaning of the words before us, than Peter himself did at the time. Our Lord had told the apostles: "It was not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father had put in his own power," (i. 7.) and there is ground to believe, that this, in many respects, was not clearly revealed to them, but left to be discovered by the event. (Note, ii. 14—21.) Had the nation of Israel, as a body, embraced the gospel, "the times of refreshment would have come from the presence of the Lord:" and when the nation shall thus turn to their long rejected Messiah, those times will come. But the prophets who foretold these events, predicted also a national rejection of the Messiah, and dreadful desolations to the people, with long continued dispersions. It was not, however, necessary, that the Holy Spirit should on this occasion, make known "the times and seasons" of these dispensations; and, without such an immediate revelation, the apostle might expect that these happy times for his nation were at hand. Even to the end of the New Testament, such an obscurity is left on these subjects, that diverse opinions still prevail, in respect of the reign of Christ during the millennium, whether it is to be personal or spiritual; (Note, Rev. xx. 4—6;) and his coming to set up his kingdom all over the earth, has been very generally, even by diligent expositors and other learned writers, confounded with his coming to judge the world: and in various other particulars this obscurity and inaccuracy is found. Now, that which was to be obscurely foretold, a prophet or apostle might but obscurely foresee: and the historian merely records the apostle's discourse.

V. 24—26. Samuel was the first prophet after Moses, who is expressly mentioned as a writer of the sacred oracles; and from him the schools of the prophets seem to have originated. (Note, 1 Sam. x. 5, 6.) It is not necessary to prove, that predictions concerning Christ are found in the writings of every one of the prophets, for the words imply a general, not a universal, proposition: yet Jonah and Nahum alone appear to be exceptions; for Obadiah certainly is not. The book of Jonah is a history, not a prophecy; and he was a remarkable type of Christ. That of Nahum, is "the burden of Nineveh," and relates expressly as a prophecy to no other subject. (Note, Nah. i. 15.)—The persons to whom the apostle spoke, were the descendants of those, to whom the prophets had been sent, and they had inherited from them the deposit of the sacred oracles, as well as the advantages of the covenant first made with their Fathers; especially that of the Messiah's arising from among them, who was the "Seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth would be blessed." (Marg. Ref. i—m.—Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. xxii. 16—18. Rom. iii. 1, 2. ix. 4, 5.) Indeed Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were prophets; (Gen. xx. 7. Ps. cv. 15;) and the Jews were their children, and heirs of the covenant made with them; unless (like profane Esau,) they should despise and refuse their birthright and blessing. (Notes, Gen. xxv. 30—34. Heb. xii. 15—17.) On this account the first proposal of the gospel was ordered to be made to them. For God, having raised up his Son Jesus, to

When brought before the council, Peter boldly declares, that the late cure had been wrought in the name of Jesus, the only Saviour, whom the rulers had rejected, 5—12. The council, unable to answer, dismiss them with a threatening charge to speak no more in the name of Jesus, which they avow themselves bound to disregard, 13—22. They return to their company; and all unite in prayer, for boldness in preaching, and that miracles of mercy might confirm their testimony, 23—30. The house being shaken, they are all filled with the Holy Spirit, and emboldened to speak the word of God, 31. The harmony and charity of the whole company, who had all things in common; the miraculous assistance granted to the apostles; and the pious liberality of Barnabas and others who had possessions, in selling them, to distribute to the needy, 32—37.

be a Prophet, Priest, and Ruler, a Mediator of a covenant, the Author of a new dispensation, as Moses had been, but in every respect unspeakably superior to Moses. Having therefore raised him from the dead, and placed him upon his glorious throne, he had sent him, by his gospel and by his Holy Spirit, to render them truly happy: not by advancing them to worldly authority and prosperity, as they had vainly expected; but by teaching, encouraging, and enabling them to turn away from all their sins, that they might walk before him, as his accepted worshippers and adopted children, in the light of his countenance, and the enjoyment of his favour. (Marg. Ref. n—q.)—‘This chapter furnishes to us additional and very striking views of the admirable spirit, which actuated and fully possessed the apostles, after the day of Pentecost. Behold their moderation and their piety, still gladly taking part in the Jewish worship (1); their simplicity, perfectly willing to be and to pass for poor men (6); their tenderness to the afflicted; (6, 7;) their indifference to themselves, and zeal for their divine Master; (12, 13, &c.) their boldness; (13—15;) yet, withal, their candour (17); and their affectionate compassion for souls (19, 25, 26).—What do we want as Christians or as ministers, but to be formed to such blessed tempers as these, thus happily blended together? And by what means were the apostles formed to them, but by the influence of that same Spirit, who is so firmly promised, and even urgently offered, to “every one” that asks his presence?—This also repels the suspicion of enthusiasm. Where is the waywardness or self-sufficiency of an enthusiast? On the contrary, moderation, candour, and modesty, are united with most decided courage and most fervent zeal, in the conduct of the apostles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The stated seasons of communion with God, and opportunities of doing good, will be welcomed with alacrity, proportioned to the degree in which we are “spiritually minded:” (Notes, Ps. lxxxiv. 1, 2. 10. P. O. Note, exxii. 1, 2;) for the carnal mind alone complains of the tediousness and too frequent returns of these sacred services; as sickly persons even loathe the sight of the food, which the healthy relish and enjoy.—Piety and charity should always be connected: those who are disabled from labour ought to be supported by benevolence; but too often, the impositions of the slothful and profligate give selfishness an excuse, for turning away from real and known objects of compassion. (Note, Luke xviii. 35—43, v. 35.)—Poverty and simplicity, and contempt of filthy lucre, in the ministers of Christ, are far better proofs of integrity, than affluence, splendour, and luxury: and, while the Lord employs others as his stewards, in dispensing wealth to relieve the necessities of their brethren; it should not grieve the “steward of the mysteries of God,” if he be constrained to say to the expecting poor, “Silver and gold I have none, but such as I have I give unto thee.” (Notes, Luke xvi. 1—13. 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2. 1 Pet. iv. 9—11.) In every ease, we ought to impart to others, according to the ability which is given to us; and “if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted” by God, “according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not;” and so it ought to be by our brethren. (Notes, 2 Cor. viii 10—15. ix. 6—11.)—If we would attempt to good purpose the healing of men’s souls, we must go forth in the name and power of Jesus Christ; calling on helpless sinners to arise, and walk in the way of holiness by faith in him. We should indeed shew affectionate regard to those whom we address: but nothing effectual will be done, till the Lord puts forth his power; and then the most impotent will receive strength to “walk in newness of life,” and shew forth the praises of God, by cheerfully joining in his worship, and by cleaving to his ministers and people. Thus the attention of men is excited; facts proclaim the efficacy of the gospel; and every true convert is a monument raised to the honour of the great Redeemer’s power and love. (Note, Is. lv. 10—13.)

V. 12—18.

Those who are honoured with usefulness should be careful to remind the people, that as the effects are not produced by their power, so they are not wrought for the sake of their holiness or piety, but for the glory of that divine Saviour, whom sinners still deny and despise: He is “the Prince of life,” and “the Author of eternal salvation to all them who obey him;” (Note, Heb. v. 7—10;) yet what immense numbers prefer the company and favour of the vilest transgressors, and the indulgence of their ruinous lusts, to him and all his blessings. But whether good have been done, or whether we have been enabled to fight successfully against sin and temptation, it has been effected “by faith in his name:” and we must go forth to all our future labours and conflicts. and our efforts to promote the cause of truth and holiness, by the same faith, engaging his almighty arm to work in us, by us, and for us, that he may have all the glory.—Those who reject, refuse, or deny Christ, do it through ignorance of one kind or another: this can in no case be admitted as an excuse; but it alleviates the guilt at some times, far more than it does at others. While unbelievers should be reproved and convicted of their sins and all the aggravations of them in the plainest and most faithful manner; yet we should admit of any extenuation, which can fairly be supposed; and we should always be careful to shew them, that the merey of God in Christ Jesus gives them ground of hope, of forgiveness, and eternal salvation, notwithstanding all their crimes. (Notes, 1 Sam. xii. 20. Ps. exxx. 3, 4.)

V. 19—26.

Blessed be God, that the sins of all, who "repent and are converted," shall assuredly be blotted out: the connexion is inseparable. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 14, 15. 2 Tim. ii. 23—26. Heb. vi. 4—6.) The change is indeed wrought by the grace of God: yet the exhortation to "repent and be converted," and the assured promise of forgiveness and reconciliation to God, through Jesus Christ, in case they obey the call, should be general to all without distinction; and all alike should be warned, that except they repent and be converted, neither the merey of God, nor the blood of Christ, will save them from perdition. When sinners are convinced of these things, they will begin to cry to the Lord, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;" "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." (Notes, Ps. li. 10. Jer. xvii. 14. xxxi. 18—20. Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. 37.)—To the penitent, converted, and believing, "times of refreshment will come from the presence of the Lord:" even the seasons of his judgments on the wicked will be attended with consolation to the souls of his people; and the day of judgment, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed to take vengeance on his enemies, will complete their salvation. (Note, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.) That solemn period, when the earth shall be burnt up, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, will be to them "the restitution of all things," "the manifestation of their adoption, and the redemption of their bodies:" (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23:) but every soul, who now refuses to hear, believe, and obey that "Prophet like unto Moses," whom God has raised up unto us, will then most certainly be destroyed from among the people.—Though we are not the children of the prophets, yet we are of those "kindreds of the earth," who are called on to inherit the blessings procured by the promised Seed of Abraham: to us also are "committed the oracles of God;" to us the glad tidings are preached, that God so loved us as to "send his Son Jesus to bless

"us, in turning every one of us from our iniquities." Let not sinners then imagine, that religion calls them to be uneasy and unhappy; but rather that it kindly offers to guide them to true felicity. (Notes, Ps. i. 1—3. xxxii. 1, 2.) Let none suppose that they can be happy, by continuing in sin; when God declares that the blessing consists in being "turned from their iniquities." Let none think that they understand and believe the gospel, who seek deliverance only from the punishment of sin, but do not expect happiness by salvation from sin itself: and let none expect to be turned effectually from their constitutional or customary iniquities, except by believing in Christ the Son of God, being "found in him," "who of God is made to" all believers, "Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption." (Note, 1 Cor. i. 26—31, v. 30.)

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. 'Before our Saviour's passion, the chief agents against him were the scribes and Pharisees; but now that the apostles do not only assert the resurrection of our Lord, but "preach through Jesus the resurrection of the dead" (2), the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection of the body, become their fiercest adversaries.' Whitby.—The Sadducees seem to have rapidly increased, among the higher orders, at this time: and as the testimony of the apostles, to the resurrection of Jesus, was subversive of their scheme of infidelity, this was to them an additional reason for opposing their doctrine. (Note, xxiii. 6—10.) It could not therefore be expected, but that, on this and on other accounts, the rulers of the Jews would persecute the apostles, as they had done Jesus himself. Accordingly, under the guidance of the person, who presided over the guard of Levites which constantly attended at the temple, they apprehended Peter and John as they were preaching, and cast them into prison; being so late in the evening, that they could not then conveniently proceed against them. (Marg. Ref.)—'Over this guard,' (of Levites) 'one of the priests was appointed captain: and this office, according to Josephus, was next in dignity to that of high priest.' Campbell. V. 4. Some expositors think, that five thousand persons were converted on this occasion; but it rather seems, that this number of believers was then completed: for it is not likely, that any one day should be honoured with greater success, than that on which the Holy Spirit first descended: nor do the words convey that idea to the

V. 5—12. Caiaphas seems to have performed the ordinary functions of the high priesthood, and Annas to have had the greater influence and authority in the council. (Notes, Luke iii. 2, 3. John xviii. 10—14.)—The other persons here mentioned were doubtless very considerable at that time; but there seems to be little certainty or importance, in the conjectures which have been formed about them. "The kindred of the high priest," must have been different persons from the heads of the twenty-four courses; as many of these were no more his kindred, than all the other priests were: that is, they were descended from Aaron, either by Eleazar, or Ithamar. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxiv. 1—6.)—The examination of Peter and John would excite very great attention; as all parties seem to have considered their interest, authority, reputation, and favourite system to be in the most imminent danger. In the question which they asked, they virtually allowed, that an extraordinary cure had been performed: (Notes, Matt. xxi. 23—32:) but they enquired, whether it were the effect of a divine power, or of incantation by the use of some "name," according to the notions which then prevailed. Accordingly Peter, "being filled with the Holy Ghost," felt none of those terrors, which had formerly led him to deny his Lord; but spoke before that great assembly, with the utmost courage, liberty, and propriety. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Notes, Matt. x. 16—20. Luke xxi. 12—19, v. 15.) He premised that the action, about which they were cited to answer as criminals, was "a good deed," an act of genuine mercy as well as of divine power: and he would have all the priests, scribes, and rulers, and all the whole nation, to understand, that it had been wrought "by the "name," or power, "of Jesus the Nazarene," who was the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Note, iii. 12—16.) They had indeed crucified him as a deceiver, for declaring himself to be "the Son of God:" but his resurrection from the dead, by the power of God, had proved his high claim; and the man, who stood before them, miraculously cured of his hopeless lameness, was a confirmation of their concurrent testimony to that event. Indeed the crucified and risen Jesus was that illustrious person, of whom David prophesied, as of a Stone, designed to be the Cement, Support, and Ornament of the whole spiritual temple; and they were the builders, (by office and authority in the church,) who had set at nought that Stone, and thrown it aside as utterly worthless. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, Ps. cxviii. 19—24. Matt. xxi. 40—44.)—But, according to that prophecy, he was now exalted to the highest authority in heaven, as the anointed Saviour, and the only Mediator between God and Man: insomuch that there was "no salvation in any other" person, or way, either for the rulers or people; nor "any "other name under heaven given among men," by which either he, or they, or any man might be saved from destruction. This plainly intimated, that no man could be saved, except in a way of God's express appointment; and that the rulers themselves must either be saved by Jesus, or perish for ever. (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—Some learned men have laboured to prove, that healing, or the cure of bodily disorders, is meant in the concluding verse; and not eternal salvation; because the same original word in some instances signifies healing. In fact, it denotes deliverance, whether from disease, slavery, death, or damnation; and the context must fix the meaning. But in this place, the miracle of the man who had been healed, was merely adduced as a proof that Jesus was risen from the dead, and consequently the Messiah, the Son of God, and the only Saviour for sinners. The apostles, the rulers, and audience, did not want miraculous cures of bodily diseases; but they all needed a Saviour and salvation: the name of Jesus is given to men of every age and nation, as that by which alone believers are saved from the wrath to come, and "with an everlasting salvation;" not from bodily sickness and temporal death. Indeed every reader must perceive, what energy there was in the address to the consciences of these persecutors, according to the obvious interpretation of it; and how this vain criticism enervates it, and causes all its spirit and vigour to evaporate.—It is observable, that the rulers never mentioned to the apostles, the report of their having stolen the body of Jesus, though they were so fairly called upon to do it;

13 ¶ Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they ^bwere unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled; ^cand they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus.

14 And ^d beholding the man which was healed standing with them, ^ethey could say nothing against it.

15 But when they had commanded them ^fto go aside out of the council, they conferred among themselves,

16 Saying, ^gWhat shall we do to these men? for that indeed ^ha notable miracle hath been done by them, ⁱis manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem; ^jand we cannot deny it.

17 But ^kthat it spread no further among the people, ^llet us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name.

V. 13-22. “Unlearned and ignorant men.” (13) ‘This, for three centuries, was the objection against the professors of Christianity: ... yet it is a great confirmation of the Christian faith; and shews, as Justin Martyr well observes, that it was not of human, but divine original; and that being with Jesus was sufficient to make the ignorant and unlearned wise.’ Whitby. (Note, John vii. 14-17.)—It is probable, that the council had hoped to overawe the apostles, into silence and submission: but when they found with what constancy and courage they replied, and with what boldness they charged them with having crucified the Messiah; and when they considered that they were persons of mean education, obscure station, and strangers to the habits of publick life; they were greatly surprised, and recollected that they had seen them with Jesus, when they had laid wait to ensnare him as he taught in the temple, or when he was apprehended.

(Marg. Ref. b—d.) And, as the man who had been healed was upon the spot, ready to attest the reality of the miracle; they could neither object any thing to the incontestable fact, nor deny the conclusion which was drawn from it. To conceal their perplexity, therefore, they ordered the apostles to withdraw for a while: and, having consulted together what they should do in so difficult a case, they agreed that it would be in vain to deny the miracle; as it was manifest to all men, that it had been wrought by Peter and John, in the name of Jesus the Nazarene. It was, however, necessary to do something effectual to stop the progress of a doctrine, which tended to bring disgrace upon them, to subvert their authority, and, as they imagined, to ruin the nation. (Notes, John xi. 47-53. xii. 9-11.) They therefore determined, in defiance of conviction, to forbid the apostles, in the severest terms, on pain of their heaviest displeasure, “to preach any more at all in the name of that Jesus,” whom they had just before punished as a deceiver; which sentence they resolved to justify and support, by prosecuting those who espoused the same cause. (Marg. Ref. f—m.) To this, Peter and John replied, with great constancy and propriety, by demanding, whether it was reasonable, or “a righteous thing, in the sight of God,” to regard the injunctions of men, more than his commandments. They were divinely commissioned and expressly commanded to “preach in the name of Jesus:” and however they might respect the authority, or fear the indignation of the rulers; their inward conviction of the truth and importance of their doctrine, and the remembrance of those things, which they had witnessed concerning their crucified, risen, and ascended Lord, and heard from him, would constrain them to declare his name and salvation to all around them. (Marg. Ref. n—r.—Notes, Is. xxx. 8-11. Jer. xxvi. 12-15. xxxviii. 1-6. Am. vii. 10-17. Mic. ii. 6, 7. 2 Cor. v. 13-15.)—This bold declaration induced the rulers to add still severer

25 Who ^b by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, ^c Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things?

26 The ^d kings of the earth stood threatenings; but at the same time, they dismissed them: for, having no plausible reason to alledge, they dared not venture the consequences of punishing them; as the people shewed them great favour, and acknowledged the miraculous cure performed, to be a glorious display of divine power and mercy in the midst of them. Indeed the instantaneous recovery of one born a cripple, and now more than forty years old, was a most astonishing effect of divine power! (Marg. Ref. s—u.)—Not only the energetick and conclusive discourses of the apostles are admirable; but “the meekness of wisdom,” united with firmness, which distinguish all their replies;—replies often made to persons, whose presence must have been suited to daunt men of their station and their habits. They never shrink, and they are never disrespectful. They refuse to comply with the injunctions of their hostile superiors no further, than they feel themselves compelled to it by the imperious sense of duty. Their coolness, and self-possession, in the presence of persecutors, is not that affected and ostentatious, and of course irritating coolness, which some have displayed; whose conduct has seemed to say, ‘See how indifferent we are to you! how much we are your superiors! In fact, how much we despise you!’ This invites persecution; whereas the apostles always declined and avoided it, if they could.—This smiling self-complacent coolness may be as very a working of corrupt nature, as fleeing from the cross; and not a much more difficult working in certain circumstances. It lives upon its own admiration, and the admiration which it expects from by-standers; food which will support nothing that “belongs to the Spirit.” (Note, Dan. iii. 16—18.)—It should be remembered, that this was the first time, in which the apostles were called to encounter opponents armed with power. (Note, Matt. xxvi. 69—75.)—Took knowledge. (13) If John was the “disciple who was known to the high priest;” this language concerning him, as well as Peter, would scarcely have been used. V. 23—28. It is generally supposed, that the company, to which the apostles returned, consisted of the hundred and twenty persons before mentioned, who probably were assembled to pray in their behalf. (Marg. Ref. y.—Note, i. 15.) Under the impression of the report made to them by Peter and John, and by the influence of the same Spirit, they all united, as with one heart and soul, in prayer to the Lord, the omnipotent Creator of the world; and in doing this, they introduced with peculiar propriety a prophecy concerning the Messiah, which God had “spoken by the “mouth of his servant David.”—Before our Lord’s crucifixion, the apostles had overlooked all the predictions of this kind; but now they remembered and clearly understood them. (Marg. Ref. z—e.—Note, Ps. ii. 1—3.)—The language, used in applying this prophecy to Jesus, may refer to his immaculate conception by the Holy Spirit. Thus he received his human nature perfectly holy; and the union of the same Spirit preserved that holiness, in full perfection, through all the temptations and trials of his life and death. This aggravated the guilt of those, who hated and opposed the “holy Child” and righteous Servant of God. Yet both Herod the tetrarch or king of Galilee, who professed the Jewish religion, and all the rulers of God’s chosen people, and Pilate who was a professed idolater, with the bulk of the Jewish nation, as well as the Gentile attendants on Pilate, had united together to treat him with the utmost cruelty and contempt. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, Matt. xxvii. 24—44. Luke xxiii. 1—25.) But they in this were only led to “whatsoever his “hand and counsel had determined before to be done.” (*Marg. Ref.—Notes, ii. 22—24. “upon them all.” Some interpret this of the great favour shewn the Christians, by the people in general; but the phrase is different from that before used. (ii. 47. Luke ii. 40. 52.) The special favour of God manifested to them; and the powerful effects of his sanctifying grace, in forming them to be such holy, lovely, and happy characters, seem to be especially intended.—The language used, concerning the liberal communication of all the property of the more affluent, with their poor brethren, who were thus exempted from all want; and of their confidence in the disinterested faithfulness of the apostles is suited, as by a specimen, to shew, what Christianity would effect, in meliorating the condition of mankind, if universally and cordially embraced. V. 36, 37. Perhaps Barnabas was one of the seventy disciples: he became afterwards so eminent as to be spoken of as an apostle. (xiv. 14.) It is probable, that his name was given him on account of his talent, in exhorting and encouraging sinners to come to Christ, and believers to cleave to him in the midst of persecution. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Note, xi. 22—24.) The estate which he sold was an inheritance that he possessed; and not any land which he held as a Levite by purchase, or by inheritance. As Barnabas was born in Cyprus, perhaps the estate lay there: but that is not said. The money, which probably was a considerable sum, was “laid at the apostles’ feet,” who for a time took the charge of distributing it: but it was soon found expedient to employ others in that service. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The zeal of avowed infidels to make proselytes, and their unwillingness that others should believe a future state of retributions, seem at first sight unaccountable: for if this be a delusion, it can do men no harm; if their sentiments be true, they can do no good. But the honour of being thought wiser than others, and qualified to undeceive a deluded multitude, has abundant charms for the vain-glorious mind. Moreover, infidels have their misgivings, and firmly believe their own reasonings only in proportion as others seem convinced by them: when therefore contrary doctrines are taught with confidence and success; they are secretly alarmed, lest after all they should find themselves mistaken. But, whether the motive be regard to authority, or interest, or reputation, or superstition, or inward quietness, or all combined; ungodly men will be grieved when the gospel is successfully preached, and their vices and errors exposed: and ministers may generally expect contempt and persecution from unbelievers, of discordant principles and parties, in proportion as God honours and prospers them: yet “the gates of hell can never prevail against the church” of Christ.—The harmless and useful servants of God have often been indicted as criminals, for “their work and labour of love,” when profligates have escaped with impunity: and ungodly priests and elders, and their connexions, have commonly been most forward in these prosecutions. Nay, to this day, instances are not wanting, in which reading the scriptures, social prayer, and religious conversation meet with frowns and checks; when indolent, and dissipated, profligate, heretical, if not openly infidel churchmen escape unensured, or are distinguished by preferments! If, however, we observe the instructions and obey the precepts of Christ, he will bear us out; and the teaching of his Spirit will render the most timid bold in his cause.—The despised Redeemer must be confessed before his most malignant enemies, by all who would be owned by him before the assembled world: (Note, Matt. x. 32, 33:) and if they, who are builders by office, reject this precious Corner-Stone of the living Temple; we must, when called to it, fairly shew them their folly, guilt, and danger, how much soever they may resent it: for assuredly “there is no salvation in any other; nor any other name given to men,” by which any one, “under the whole heaven,” can be “delivered from the wrath to come,” from sin and Satan, and all evil, and made partaker of eternal glory.

V. 13—22.

Those who boldly declare the truths of scripture, will commonly be considered as “unlearned and ignorant men;” while they “determine to know nothing but Christ crucified:” but if they speak and act as those who “have been with Jesus,” who have imbibed his instructions and spirit, and learned to copy his example; they will, by well doing and sound argument, put gainsayers to silence. Yet this comes far short of converting them: for when avarice, ambition, or any corrupt passion rules within, men shut their eyes and close their hearts in enmity against the light; and determine to bear down,

CHAP. V.

Ananias and Sapphira, combining to tempt the Holy Spirit by a lie in respect of land sold by them, at Peter's word fall down dead, 1—11. The apostles work many and great miracles, and have much success in their ministry, 12—16. The rulers cast them all into prison, 17, 18. An angel releases them, and directs them to preach openly in the temple, 19, 20. They are at length brought before the council, and, being examined, they boldly bear testimony to Jesus, as exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, 21—32. The rulers, being "cut to the heart," purpose to slay them, but are restrained by the counsel of Gamaliel, 33—39. The apostles are beaten, and dismissed with injunctions, not to speak any more in the name of Jesus, 40. They rejoice in their sufferings, and proceed diligently in preaching Jesus the Christ, 41, 42.

if they can, by authority and violence, what, in their consciences, they perceive to bear the stamp of truth and divinity. (Note, John iii. 19—21.) But whatever deference be due to rulers, chief priests, and counsils; we must not hesitate to declare, that we will "obey God rather than man," and venture all consequences in so doing: yet this should always be done with modesty, meekness, and unaffected reluctance to disobey our superiors, in church or state. Indeed, when the heart is powerfully influenced by heavenly love and zeal, and the understanding clearly perceives the importance of the truth and the line of duty, a man "cannot but speak" what he has seen and learned: he has a moral inability to refrain; his holy principles have a commanding influence over him, superior to the tyrant's frown, or the terrors of persecution; and as far as God has work for such a man to finish, he will restrain the wrath of his most potent enemies, or turn the tide of popular favour in his behalf, as he sees good. (Notes, Jer. xx. 7—9. 2 Cor. v. 13—16.)

V. 23—37.

Believers may, in various ways, be confined among those who fear not God: but, "being let go, they will return to their own company."—Whatever trials we meet with, fervent prayer is our never-failing resource; and the more we unite in it, as "with one heart," the more signal answers may be expected. All things are alike easy to him, who made the heavens and the earth: vain therefore must be the devices, which princes or people, how powerful or numerous soever they be, can imagine against the Lord, and his anointed Saviour; for when power, policy, and tumult, have done their utmost, they have but effected what "the hand and counsel of the Lord had determined before should be done:" in effect, they have only digged a pit for their own destruction; and rolled a stone, which will rebound upon them and crush them to pieces.—He knows the power and rage of our foes; and we should not so much pray for exemption from trials, and protection from dangers, as for grace to enable us steadily to do our duty, and to glorify our God in the midst of them all. Our prayers should especially be presented in love, even for our bitterest persecutors: we should request that the Lord's "hand may be stretched out to heal" and to save, not to avenge and destroy. Thus we may expect to be effectually answered, and to be filled with inward confidence and comfort, amidst all outward tribulations.—But let us carefully consider, the effects produced by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, in those blessed days, when "great grace was upon all" the company of believers. They were "all of one heart and soul;" they had but one common interest to attend on; their love to the brethren was united with equal contempt of worldly riches, and disregard to worldly interests and indulgences; so that the poorest had no want, the wealthiest no exclusive possessions. When such dispositions prevail, and are exercised according to the circumstances of the times, the testimony of ministers will have a peculiar energy upon the minds of their hearers; especially if their own conduct exhibits an example of integrity, disinterestedness, and love: and if it be evident that, like their Master, they deem it "more blessed to give than to receive." (Note, xx. 32—35.)

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—11. The reputation acquired by those who sold their estates must have been very great: so that it is not wonderful, that the ambition of this honour should, in some instances, over-power the fear of persecution, in the hearts of those who were not upright in the sight of God. But the increase of professed Christians of this character would have disgraced the cause, and spread an in-three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.

8 And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much.

9 Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

10 Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in, and found her dead, and, carrying her forth, buried her by her husband.

fection in the church. The Lord was therefore pleased to check this evil, at the opening of the New Testament dispensation; as he had others, at the promulgation of the law, and the first entrance of Israel into the possession of the promised land. (Notes, Lev. x. 1-11. Josh. vii.)—Ananias and Sapphira, seeing how those persons were respected, who had parted with their whole substance, to supply the wants of their poor brethren, agreed together to sell the land, to secrete a part of the money, and to give the rest to the apostles as the whole price. In doing this, they perhaps expected to have a maintenance from the common stock, and yet to reserve a part of their substance to themselves: but the desire of reputation seems to have predominated. (Marg. Ref. a-d.) Peter however was immediately shewn the deception which they were practising, and charged it upon Ananias in express terms. (Notes, 2 Kings v. 20-27.) His language on this occasion implied, that, whatever Satan might suggest, he could not have “filled the heart” of Ananias with this wickedness, had he not been consenting. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e-f. —Notes, John xiii. 1-5, v. 2. 18-30, v. 27.) The falsehood, told to the apostles, was a bold attempt to impose upon “the Spirit of truth” himself, who so manifestly spoke and acted by them: and this was to “lie unto God,” and not unto men; which is a plain testimony to the Deity and personality of the Holy Spirit.—The estate continued Ananias’s property, even after his profession of Christianity; the sale of it was not a matter of compulsion, but of voluntary choice; and even the money, after it was sold, was at his own disposal: whence it appears, that this liberality was not expressly required of the primitive Christians, but was the result of their abundant zeal and love. So that the crime of Ananias did not so much consist in retaining part of the price of the land, as in endeavouring in so solemn a transaction, to impose upon the apostles with a deliberate pertinacious lie, the result of avarice combined with ostentation. (Marg. Ref. g-i.)—As his death was the immediate effect of divine power, and mercy denounced by Peter, it struck terror into all who heard of it; and he was buried immediately in his own garments, without further preparation or mourning; as Sapphira was afterwards, when, persisting in the same horrid falsehood, she was struck dead by the awful judgment of God. (Marg. Ref. k-s.—Lev. x. 4-6. Notes, 2 Kings i. 10. ii. 23, 24. 2 Cor. xiii. 7-10.)—This apparent severity, on two detected hypocrites, was real mercy to numbers: it excited a reverential fear, and a holy jealousy in the whole company; it doubtless brought them to strict self-examination, prayer, and circumspection, and a dread of hypocrisy, covetousness, or vain-glory: it prevented the increase of scandals in the church, and the intrusion of hypocrites; and thus it conduced to render the gospel honourable in the eyes of the people.—We may also observe, that this event was a divine attestation to the apostles’ integrity and veracity, fully intelligible by their enemies. God would never have inflicted such a judgment, at their word, upon inferior dissemblers, if their testimony to the resurrection of Jesus had been a deception: and it shewed that they would not connive at iniquity in those of their own party, or for the sake of their private interest, or that of the society.—Many expositors suppose, that Ananias had made a vow, (either publicly or secretly,) to give his estate for the support of the Christian cause; and that sacrilege was the crime, for which he was visited: but the history never mentions this. He had, from corrupt motives, attempted to impose upon the apostles and upon the Holy Spirit; and his wife had joined him, in this impious and hypocritical attempt.—The papists adduce this passage, as a proof that the successors of Peter (that is, the pope and the ecclesiasticks devoted to him,) are invested with the secular as well as spiritual sword. Let them, therefore, use the weapons of Peter wherever they will, but none else; and let them see whether the same effects will follow.—Tempt, &c. (9) ‘As often as any thing is done with an evil conscience; so often men bring this sentence on themselves, and as much as lieth in them provoke God to wrath; as if they purposely aimed to make trial, whether he be just and almighty or not.’ Beza. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Ex. xvii. 1, 2. Matt. iv. 5-7.)—The case, however, of Ananias and Sapphira was very peculiar, and their guilt exceedingly atrocious.—This single example of severity was made, not on avowed enemies and persecutors, but on false friends. Thus Judas, not Caiaphas, was marked out by his awful end, as the first object of divine vengeance on the murderers of Christ. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 3-5.) Kept back. (2) Ενοσφισατο. 3. Tit. ii. 10. the apostles, was continually exerted in multiplied miracles of mercy. (Note, iv. 29—31.) The whole company of believers were as firmly attached to the apostles, and united to each other, as they had been before: and they constantly met, at stated times, "in Solomon's porch," to join in the worship of God; when, probably, the apostles preached and wrought miracles, as opportunity was given them. (Note, iii. 1—11, v. 11.) But none of those, who were not willing to renounce all things for the sake of Christ, ventured to join them; though they were greatly honoured by the people in general, and numbers of real converts were continually added by baptism to the church, and by faith to the Lord. (Marg. Ref. y—b.)—Join himself, &c. (13) 'As if he had been a believer, and by way of putting a cheat on the apostles. Such unbelievers, as were displeased with the apostles, and hated the cause, would have been glad to put any trick upon them, that they might thereby lessen their esteem among the people; yet durst not: seeing it might prove no less than fatal for any to go about to deceive them.'—Indeed the power of God so evidently attended the apostles, that the people, both in Jerusalem and from the adjacent towns, applied for maraeulous cures, by laying their sick in "every street;" (Marg.) that the "shadow of Peter," as he passed along, might fall upon them, from which they expected the benefit: nor were any of them disappointed. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Note, John xiv. 7—14, v. 12.)—As Peter was the readiest speaker, and stood foremost in every transaction, and as he was one of the first who experienced persecution; it seems that he was more noticed by the people, than any of the other apostles, in these miracles. (Note, xix. 8—12, v. 12.) 'Hence 'it is ridiculous to argue, that one or the other (Peter or Paul) was prince of the apostles, or that the reliques of 'holy men are to be venerated.' Whitby.

V. 17—25. These transactions could not but perplex and enrage the high priest and his party; whether their personal interests and reputation, or religious prejudices, or their political views, were considered: especially that prevailing party, which had adopted the heresy of the Sadducees, must foresee the ruin of their seet, as the consequence of the success of the gospel. (Note, iv. 4.)—They therefore imprisoned all the apostles, as disturbers of the publick peace, in the common jail designed for malefactors. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) But an angel, unperceived by the keepers, set them at liberty, and ordered them to go boldly into the temple, and proclaim to the people "all the words of this life;" that is, the whole gospel of him who is "the Way, and the Truth, and the Life;" by which alone sinners can obtain eternal life. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) This direction was intended, as an exception to the general rule before given by our Lord, that "when persecuted in one city they should flee to another;" which

26 Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without violence: for ^x they feared the people, lest they should have been stoned:

27 And when they had brought them, ^y they set them before the council: and the high priest asked them,

28 Saying, ^z Did not we straitly command you, that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, ^a and intend to bring this man's blood upon us.

29 Then Peter and the other apostles answered, and said, ^c We ought to obey God rather than men.

present circumstances required for the triumph of the gospel, the encouragement of believers, and the confusion of their enemies. (Notes, viii. 1. Matt. x. 23.) (Notes, Matt. iii. 2. v. 3.) Through this exalted Prince and Saviour, the Israelites, and even the rulers who had crucified him, were encouraged to repent, by the proposal of forgiveness; and suitable instructions, motives, and exhortations were given them. Thus he gave them “place,” for repentance; in which sense the phrase, here employed, has it seems been once used by Josephus. Yet it is the evident doctrine of scripture, (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, xi. 18. Jer. xxxi. 18—20. 31—34. Ez. xi. 17—20. Zech. xii. 9—14. 2 Tim. ii. 23—26,) and likewise of our liturgy, that true repentance is “the gift of God;” and to exclude this most obvious meaning of the words, as many expositors do, is, in fact, an attempt to improve the language of scripture, and to obscure one evidence of our Saviour’s Deity, and of all salvation coming wholly from his fulness of grace. ‘Repentance was not indeed actually wrought in Israel, by his efficacious grace;’ that is, not in all Israel; for it certainly was in great numbers: but if any who heard the apostles were convinced that they must repent or perish, yet found their hearts still hard and their wills rebellious; was it not a most important and seasonable instruction, to be assured, that Jesus was exalted “to give repentance,” as well as pardon to the penitent? that, as one with tears cried to him, “Help my unbelief;” they might cry to him, “Turn thou me that I may be turned:” “Pour on me the Spirit of grace and supplications, that I may look unto thee, whom I have pierced, and mourn” with “that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation.”

V. 32. Marg. Ref.—The Holy Ghost, &c.] Notes, John xv. 26, 27. xvi. 12, 13. Heb. ii. 1-4, v. 4.—‘The testimony, arising from this miraculous communication of the Spirit to Christians at that time, entirely removes the objection from Christ’s not appearing in publick, after his resurrection. For had there been any imposture, it had been easier of the two, to have persuaded the people at a distance, that he had so appeared to the Jewish rulers, or even to the multitude, and yet had been rejected; than that he had given his servants such extraordinary powers. Since, had this assertion been false, every one might have been a witness to the falsehood of such a pretence, without the trouble and expense of a journey to Jerusalem, or any other distant place.’ Doddridge.

Obey.] Πειθαρχεσθω. See on 29.—‘There is no true obedience without faith, or true faith without obedience.’ Beza.

V. 33-39. (Note, ii. 37-40.) The rulers were cut by the words of Peter; they were convicted, tortured, enraged, and alarmed, but not humbled or changed: ‘they gnashed their teeth, as if one drew a saw;’ (Beza;) and therefore they desperately counselled, or resolved, to put the whole company of the apostles to death. But Gamaliel (whose reputation is very high among the Jews to this day, and who seems to have been a man of great judgment and prudence in secular matters,) cautioned them against so violent a measure. Probably at this time he had some conviction of the truth of the gospel: but, as he was the teacher of Saul, who was a determined persecutor, it may be questioned whether he long retained his tolerating principles. (Marg. Ref. r-t.—Note, xxii. 1-5.) However, Gamaliel was a Pharisee, and, as such, a decided opposer of the Sadducean system, and so more ready to take this view of the subject: and from some recent instances, he fully proved that the interposition of the council in so decided a manner, was neither needful nor safe. (Marg. Ref. u-b.)—‘Here Gamaliel affirms two things. First, that before those days, in which that council was assembled, arose Theudas: ... whereas the Theudas, mentioned by Josephus, ... arose, and perished by the hands of Cuspius Fadus, in the fourth year of

‘Claudius, that is, ten years after the meeting of this council. Secondly, he affirms, that Judas of Galilee arose after him, and yet he arose “in the days of the taxing,” which was under the emperor Augustus, and so thirty-four years before this council, and so this Theudas must have been at least thirty-five years before. ... Origen, who had read Josephus, and declares that he examined things relating to the scripture, ... out of a love to truth, speaks thus: ‘We say that there was one Theudas before the birth of Christ, who among the Jews declared himself to be somebody.’ And again, ‘that Judas Galileus, and Theudas who was before him, being not of God perished.’ And a third time, ‘Because they gathered from the scriptures, that the time of the Messiah was come; first Theudas, and after him Judas, tumultuated in the time of the taxing.’ Hence do the fathers unanimously say, that those words of Christ, “All that came before me were “thieves and robbers,” relate to these two, Theudas, and Judas of Galilee; which shews their belief, that both of them were before the time of Christ’s preaching. So that it is extremely evident, that the ancient fathers agreed in this, that there was a Theudas pretending to great things, even before the coming of our Lord; though Josephus has taken no notice of him.’ Whitby.—Dr. Lightfoot supposes, that the Theudas, mentioned by Josephus, was the son of this Theudas; and that he took his name, as engaging in the same enthusiastick attempts. (Note, Luke ii. 2.)—St. Luke merely records Gamaliel’s speech; and it is indisputable, that he spake of facts well known to his hearers. As to Josephus, his mistakes and omissions are so numerous and palpable, that his authority ought not to be opposed to other authentick histories; or to facts, which at the time, were known and allowed to have occurred.—From these premises, however, Gamaliel justly inferred, that if the apostles were employed in propagating an imposture, it would at length be detected, and “come to nothing;” without the rulers incurring the hatred and resentment of the people, by contending against it. But, on the other hand, if indeed it were the cause and work of God, which they were not fully sure it was not, they could not possibly prevail against it;

for if they put the apostles to death, some other persons would be raised up to carry it on: at the same time they would be "found to fight against God," and would thus bring upon themselves his omnipotent vengeance. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, ix. 3—6. xxiii. 6—10.)—According to this opinion, which was the verdict of common sense, and supported by the most conclusive arguments, the continuance of Christianity to this day, a religion, neither supported by human authority, nor paying court to any man's corrupt passions; nay, opposed by all the power, wealth, philosophy, learning, superstition, idolatry, open profaneness, false religion, vices, and popular prejudices, of the whole world; and declaring exterminating war against all the corrupt propensities of the human heart, without favouring one more than another; and, also the ruin of the Jewish church and nation, and other persecuting powers, are irrefragable demonstrations, that it was "no work or counsel of men," but indeed a revelation from God; and, that those who opposed it actually fought against him, and incurred his righteous displeasure for so doing.—How different the introduction of Christianity in the world, and its preservation and continuance to this day, from those of Paganism and Mohammedism!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—16.

No state of the church has yet occurred entirely free from hypocrites, and other evils resulting from human depravity and the subtlety of Satan: nor is there any thing so excellent, which artful men will not counterfeit, to gratify their avarice, or their love of applause and honour from men. But the conduct of numbers, even in external duties, by doing some things, and shrinking from others, proves their insincerity; and shews, that they aim to reconcile the service of God and mammon, and the reputation of piety with the interests of the world. (Notes, Matt. vi. 1—4. 24. Jam. i. 5—8.) When Satan is permitted thus "to fill the hearts" of deceivers with wicked devices; they attempt, and often successfully, to impose upon the ministers of Christ; while he, their Judge, "who hath the keys of death and hell," sees all their secret wickedness, and prepares to expose and punish it.—And does not the narrative, with which this chapter opens, most solemnly warn us, to watch against and subjugate all our passions; not only the violent and disgraceful, but the plausible likewise, the love of money and of reputation, the ambition, not only of honour from worldly men, but also of consequence in the church?—Deceit and lies are, in all things, hateful to the God of truth; but most of all, when introduced into the immediate concerns of religion. How then must he abhor those lying professions, subscriptions, and engagements, which numbers continually make at his table, or when they enter into the sacred ministry! Surely it may be said to every one who acts in this manner, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost?" "Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." If any of us are conscious of having committed so enormous a crime, let us be thankful, that the doom of Ananias has not been ours, and let us shew our deep repentance, by keeping at the utmost distance from a repetition of the atrocious prove-

CHAP. VI.

On occasion of the murmurings of the Grecians, seven persons, chosen by the church, under the direction of the apostles, are appointed by them to superintend the daily ministration to the poor; that none might be neglected, and that the apostles might cation.—Those who combine together, and encourage one another, “to tempt the Spirit of the Lord,” may expect to be joined in the same awful punishment: and when notorious criminals escape with present impunity, they are only “reserved to the day of judgment,” for more tremendous vengeance. But, on special occasions, the Lord interposes in an extraordinary manner, to detect such offenders, as are about to become a snare to some, and a scandal to others. This righteous severity often proves an important benefit to multitudes; by putting them on their guard against hypocrisy, and exciting them to watchfulness and prayer.—Whatever conduces to the purity and reputation of the church, eventually promotes its enlargement. When unsound professors of the gospel are excluded or detected, the surest method is taken to bring in an increase of true believers: and, if the apparent severity of reproof or censure, which ministers must at some times necessarily exercise, be connected with manifest and enlarged benevolence; that unfavourable impression, which might otherwise be made upon the minds of men, will be prevented; and they will notwithstanding possess confidence and affection. But that power alone, which wrought such astonishing miracles by the hands of the apostles, (though exercised in a different way,) can rescue any of our apostate race from the power of sin and Satan, and add them as believers to the company of spiritual worshippers. God will, in some degree, work by all his faithful servants; and every one, who applies to him in humble faith, shall certainly be healed, as to the dire maladies of his soul.

V. 17—32.

How wretched must they be, whose vexation is increased by the success of the gospel! They may grow more violent in enmity and opposition: but in vain will they attempt to confine those, whom the Lord wills to be at liberty; to slay those whom he wills to live; to disgrace those whom he wills to honour; or even to distress or affright those whom he wills to be joyful and courageous. (Notes, xvi. 25—28. 35—40.) His mighty angels delight to minister to his persecuted servants; and, at the least intimation of his purpose, they are equally ready to destroy their persecutors. (Notes, xii. 5—11. 20—23, v. 23.) As long therefore as we are preserved in life, we should go on with our several duties; and those who are called to “preach the gospel,” should be “instant in season and out of season,” without yielding to fear, or self-indulgence, in preaching “all the words of this life” to mankind.—How vain, yet how obstinate, is the contest, which men maintain against their Creator! They see at times, that the word and hand of the Lord are against them, and they tremble for the consequences: yet they will proceed! And, after all their convictions, they are more restrained by the fear of man, than by the “fear of him who is able to destroy body and soul in hell!” Men of this

“give themselves to the word of God and to prayer,” 1—6. The word of God greatly prevails, 7. Stephen, full of faith and the Holy Spirit, confutes those who disputed against him, 8—10. They suborn witnesses, who, before the council, falsely accuse him of blasphemy against the law and the temple, 11—14. His face shines like the face of an angel, 15.

character have often opposed their mandates and authority to those of God, and accused the most exemplary and peaceable ministers, of sedition and rebellion; because their doctrines tended to expose the wickedness of their opposers, in its proper colours to mankind. We must, however, adhere to our principles: “We ought to obey God rather than man;” and they, who persist in opposing Christ and his cause, must bear the blame. He is a gracious Saviour to all those, who submit to him as a Prince; and he will employ all his power to protect and exalt them likewise. He delights in forgiving the penitent, yea, in “giving repentance and remission of sins” to all the Israel of God; nor will he withhold these inestimable gifts from any who seek to him for them. But he will surely destroy all those, “who will not have him to reign over them:” this every man will perceive, in proportion as he regards the testimony of his apostles; and of the Holy Spirit whom God has always given as the Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter of those who obey his beloved Son.

V. 33—42.

While the convincing arguments of the persecuted, and their own reproaching consciences, increase the rage of determined enemies; the Lord still varies his methods of defeating their malignant purposes. He has all hearts in his hands: and he sometimes uses the candour and sound policy of learned and eminent men, who do not embrace the gospel, to moderate the counsels of outrageous and irrational opposers. Common sense suggests a caution to every considerate man, to take heed to himself what he does, respecting those who so much as appear to be the servants of God. Experience and observation determine, that the success or reputation of religious impostures, not supported by human authority, or by flattering men’s vices and corrupt affections, will be short-lived. The abettors of all such designs have recourse to unhallowed means, to gratify their ambition, or to compass their secular designs. Many have drawn the sword in this cause, and have perished by it; some have been scattered; and others have exposed their iniquity to the whole world: so that “every counsel, or work, which is of men,” will in one way or other “come to nought.”—But while the teachers of religion are harmless and peaceable members of the community, and appear zealous for the truths and commandments of God, according to their views of them; the caution is universally to be regarded, “Refrain from these men, and let them alone:” neither deride, revile, molest, nor injure them; from personal dislike, or from political jealousy. If they are insincere or erroneous, they will in time appear to be so; and no other means should be used, except calm discussion and kind usage: but if their cause be that “of God, it cannot be overthrown,” and all who attempt it, will be “found to have fought against God.”—But when the enmity of the carnal mind is restricted in its exercise, and cannot, or dare not, vent itself in bloody persecution; it seeks gratification, by dealing in reproaches, calumnies, menaces, insults, and other injuries. We should, however, “rejoice to be counted worthy” to endure shame and pain, in that cause, in which “Jesus endured the cross, and despised the shame,” and for the sake of so gracious and glorious a Benefactor. (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) We should daily endeavour to recommend him, and his salvation, to all around us: and, whether ministers labour in publick, and preach to large congregations, or resort to the houses of their friends and brethren, Jesus, the anointed Saviour of lost sinners, should be the great subject of their instructions, the centre of all their doctrines, exhortations, and encouragements, and the favourite theme of their social conversation.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. “The Grecians,” or Hellenists, were Jews, or proselytes, who, having generally resided in other countries, spoke only the Greek language, and used the Greek version of the scriptures in their synagogues; by which they were distinguished from those, who spoke a dialect of the Hebrew.—The accession of numbers to the church, perhaps chiefly from among the poor, might render it more difficult, than at the first to afford them all so plentiful a support, as would have been desirable: (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, ii. 44—47. iv. 32—35:) and, as the greatest part of the publick stock must have been contributed by the Hebrews; perhaps those who acted under the apostles in this business, thought it right to shew more favour to the poor widows of that description, than to the others: but we may also suppose, that the Grecians were rather too jealous, and suspected more partiality than there actually was. Murmurs, however, and discontents, having been thus excited, the most dangerous disputes and divisions might have ensued, as has frequently happened in great revivals of religion, to the immense detriment of the common cause: and even the apostles themselves might have been exposed to censure or suspicion; but they, being directed by the Holy Spirit, took a most effectual method to prevent these pernicious consequences. (Notes, Ex. xviii. 13—26. Num. xi. 11—17. Deut. i. 12—18.) The apostles stated to the church, or congregation of believers, whom they called together for that purpose, that it was not reasonable for them to leave their important ministry, to superintend the distribution of their bounty, and see the tables of the poor supplied: and as these murmurs had not arisen through their fault, so they could not consistently attend to the proper means for preventing them. (Marg. Ref. g—r.) It would therefore be most proper, for the church to elect suitable persons, to lay out their contributions in the most satisfactory manner; both among the poor, and in other necessary expenses. They therefore counselled them to “look out seven men,” (as sufficient for the present,) of known probity and integrity, and “full of the Holy Spirit;” and they would set them apart for this service, and commit the whole business to their management; that they (the apostles) might have no interruption, in giving themselves up to the preaching of the gospel, and to prayer for its success. This proposal giving them universal satisfaction, the choice was immediately made, and the apostles solemnly set apart the persons chosen for the work, by prayer and imposition of hands.—We read nothing more concerning any of them, except Stephen and Philip; (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, 8—15. vii. viii. xxi. 7—14;) unless Nicolas (“a proselyte,” as distinguished from those who were of Jewish extraction,) were the founder of the heretical sect, called Nicolaitans, which is not at all probable. (Note, Rev. ii. 14—16.) All the names seem to be of Greek original; and perhaps they were chosen from among the Hellenists, to give the more entire satisfaction.—It is evident, that they were appointed to take care of the property of the church, and not to the pastoral office; and the argument hence deduced to prove that every congregation ought to choose its own spiritual pastors, or for popular elections of ministers in any way, proves nothing. Men are generally careful enough, to entrust their property in the hands of suitable persons; but their souls are seldom more in danger, than when they follow “teachers after their own hearts.”—Beza indeed seems to think, that if the apostles would not appoint deacons, except by the choice of the church, much less would they ordain ministers, or spiritual pastors: but this only proves, that scriptural ground for that plan, which he zealously supported, was not easily found, and that arguments were scarce.—Whatever may be said about the expediency or in expediency of these arrangements; the divine authority of them should be considered as another question. It must, however, be allowed, that matters are far removed from what is reasonable, scriptural, or profitable, respecting the general management of these most important concerns, in almost every part of the visible church, and that pastors should not be forced on congregations, against whom they can bring just and reasonable objections, whether in respect of doctrine or character.—It has been generally taken for granted, that these seven persons were ordained, or appointed, to the office of “deacons;” yet they are not so called, either in this chapter, or elsewhere: and as the word rendered “deacon” is often translated servant, or minister, and used concerning Christ himself; (Rom. xv. 8; Gr.) some have questioned whether there were such a distinct order in the church, during the times of the apostles. Nothing, however, can be more evident, than that such an order existed, and was well known, when St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Philippians and his first epistle to Timothy. (Notes, Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 8-13.)—“Now if they” (the deacons,) “were not instituted here by the apostles, I desire to know when, where, and by whom, they were instituted, and what other record we have left us of such an institution of them.” Whitby. If then, the office of deacons was instituted on this occasion; it seems undeniable, that they were appointed solely to take care of the temporal concerns of the church; and not, as deacons, to preach, or to administer sacred ordinances, except by assisting the elders, presbyters, or bishops, as some think they did, in distributing the bread and wine at the Lord’s supper.—“This is as true of the deacons, mentioned by St. Paul; (1 Tim. iii.) there is not a word said of their ministering at the altar.” Whitby. He might have added, “or of their preaching.” Yet it is plain, that Stephen did preach, and that Philip both preached and baptized; and he is even called “the evangelist.” (xxi. 8.) It therefore occurs to enquire, whether they were preachers of the gospel, before their appointment as deacons, or became preachers afterwards. The following remarks are of some importance in this question. “The choice was committed to them;” (the laity;) “yet this was done 1st, by the particular appointment of the apostles, for “the twelve called “the multitude, and said unto them, Look ye out seven “men.” 2^{dly}. They specify the number, and the qualifications, of the persons to be chosen to this office. 3^{dly}. They reserve to themselves the appointment of them to this work: saying, “Look ye out seven men, whom “we may appoint over this business.” And, lastly, “they “only laid their hands on them.” So in the case of the rulers over thousands, &c. ... Moses saith, as here, “Choose to yourselves men of wisdom and understanding, and known to your tribes; ... and I will set them “to be your heads.” Accordingly he both appointed them, and instructed them in the discharge of their office. (Deut. i. 13-17.) It seems very unlikely, that the apostles would have made this one requisite of the persons to be chosen, that they should be “full of the” extraordinary gifts of the “Holy Ghost;” ...if their office

‘ had confined them to the ministry of the widows at Jerusalem. ... Being “men full of the Holy Ghost;” and ‘ of that wisdom which enabled them to teach others; we ‘ cannot reasonably conceive, that they were disabled by ‘ their ordination to this office, from doing that work for ‘ which they were fitted, and as it were appointed, by these ‘ gifts of the Spirit conferred on them. In a word, it is ‘ evident from this history, that before the ordination of ‘ these deacons, the apostles themselves were engaged in ‘ this work; for the treasure of the church was “laid at ‘ “the apostles’ feet, and distribution was made of it to ‘ “every man according as he had need.” This distribu- ‘ tion, therefore, must be made by them, who had this ‘ treasure in their hands; and therefore they appoint these ‘ seven over this business, to ease themselves of this trouble, that they might “give themselves” more entirely ‘ “to prayer and to the ministry of the word.” ... Now ‘ surely that work which the apostles personally performed ‘ for a season, must be consistent with their commission ‘ to “teach and baptize all nations.”’ Whitby. This statement does not prove, what the learned author seems to have intended, that the deacons, as such, were appointed to preach and baptize: but, to me at least, it renders it highly probable, that some of the seven were previously ministers, or evangelists; and that they spared time from the ministry of the word, for this service, as the apostles had done before the appointment of these assistants. Some of the fathers assert, that they were all of the number of the seventy disciples: but of this there is no other proof. In the abundance of spiritual and miraculous gifts, communicated at this favoured season, it is highly probable, that many were thus qualified for important services, who had not at present a call or opening to perform them. The apostles, in counselling the church, make no distinction between such as had been employed in the ministry, and others: and probably some of each were chosen. Stephen and Philip, we may suppose, were of the former; and when Stephen was martyred, and Philip fully engaged at a distance, others might be chosen as deacons. And it appears to me very likely, that, both at this and future periods, many, who were appointed deacons in the first instance, afterwards became evangelists or pastors; and when they were fully employed, other deacons were appointed. (Note, 1 Tim. iii. 8-13.)—Let it be especially noted, in this connexion; that those who claim to be, exclusively or particularly, the successors of the apostles, should be more excluded from temporal concerns, and all secular avocations, than even other ministers are, “that they may more entirely give themselves to prayer and “the ministry of the word.”—Laid their hands, &c. V. 7. 'A happy event of a time of trial.' Beza.—The triumph of divine grace in the conversion of "a great company of the priests;" considering the heavy loss which they must in consequence sustain, as excluded from the emoluments of the priesthood; and the persecution to which, in an especial manner, they must be exposed from the unbelieving priests and rulers, in addition to their peculiar prejudices against the gospel; has appeared to some expositors too extraordinary to be at all probable; and they propose, without authority, to alter the text, and to read, "and a great company, with some of the priests, were obedient to the faith." But that divine illumination and grace, which caused Saul the persecutor "to count all but loss for Christ;" and when "he had suffered the loss of all things, to count them but dung that he might win Christ," would be sufficient for these priests also. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 44—46. Phil. iii. 8—11.) Indeed, the triumph of the gospel, without this, would in some respects have been incomplete; and it does not become us, either to alter the scriptures, or to veil the glory and splendour of divine grace.—There were several thousands of priests in the days of Ezra: (Ezra ii. 36—39;) and a great company might embrace the gospel, and yet a large majority might persist in unbelief.—The abundant proof, in every way given, that Jesus was the Messiah, could not fail to convince the understanding of numbers among the priests and rulers; and by the grace of God, many of these acted according to their convictions: "with the heart they believed unto righteousness, and with the mouth made confession unto salvation." (Notes, xxvi. 24—29. John xii. 42, 43. Rom. x. 5—11.)—It seems probable, that some of these converted priests became ministers of the gospel: yet no intimation is given in the New Testament, of any priest, of the family of Aaron, being employed as a Christian minister. John the Baptist was a priest; Barnabas was a Levite: but nothing else, in this respect, is said either of priests or Levites. It may, then, be a matter of enquiry, whether this circumstance were not intentionally ordered, to mark, not a gradual transition, but an immediate and entire change, in the external administration of the church. (Notes, Is. lxi. 4—6. lxxvi. 19—23.)

V. 8. 'It appears plainly from the foregoing history, that it was not as a deacon, that he' (Stephen) 'preached; but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit he received eminently qualified him for that work. And no doubt many Christians, not statedly devoted to the ministry, and whose furniture was far inferior to his, would be capable of declaring Christ and his gospel to strangers, in an edifying and useful manner, and would not fail accordingly to do it, as Providence gave them a call and an opportunity.' Doddridge.—'He that will plead a commission from God to preach the gospel, without an ordinary mission, must shew the like extraordinary gifts or miraculous assistances: God never sending any person to do his work, without some testimony from himself, or from persons commissioned by him.' Whitby.—It is most likely, that Stephen was previously a preacher: but if he was not, it can hardly be supposed, that he would undertake that important office, however qualified, at Jerusalem, and amidst the apostles, without their sanction; or that others, in such circumstances, would do this. At the same time, it must fairly be allowed, that extraordinary cases may arise, which would justify the dispensing with ordinary rules; and remarkable persons may be raised up, though not endued with miraculous powers, who may be fully warranted to teach the ignorant, not only privately, but in the most publick manner; though not expressly appointed to the ministry. It is certain that John the Baptist wrought no miracles: yet his ministry (as entirely distinct from the priesthood,) was from God, without any human appointment: and it is far from clear, that all the prophets wrought miracles, indeed it is recorded of only a few of them that they did; and they were not sanctioned, but opposed, by the stated ministers of religion: yet their calling was divine. This appeared by the agreement of their instructions with the scripture, and by the effects of their labours. General rules, however, though they admit of some exceptions, form the measure of our conduct in all ordinary cases: and it is extremely dangerous to give a kind of unlimited sanction, to all who suppose themselves, or are supposed by their favourers, to be qualified for the publick ministry, to engage in it, without any appointment from the church and its ministers. of Jewish extraction. (Marg. Ref. e—k.)—"The Liberties" seem to have been the descendants of persons, who had been slaves, and had obtained their freedom: though some think, that they were Jews, who were admitted to the privilege of Roman citizens; but the word, I believe, is never used in that sense. Each of these synagogues had an academy belonging to it, where students were instructed by some Rabbi: so that these teachers, or their more forward scholars, seem to have challenged Stephen to a disputation concerning his doctrine. But they were baffled by him in argument: for he had not only truth on his side, and eminent abilities; but the Lord had endued him by the Holy Spirit, with such wisdom, judgment, temper, and utterance, as they could not withstand. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Matt. x. 19, 20. Luke xxi. 12—19.) Instead, however, of yielding to conviction, they bribed certain unprincipled persons to accuse him, before the people and the rulers, as an enemy to the Jewish church and nation: so that he was violently apprehended, brought before the council, and charged with blasphemy; for having said that Jesus of Nazareth (whom they mentioned with the utmost contempt,) had declared, that he would destroy the temple, and abrogate the Mosaic law. No doubt Stephen foretold, that Jesus would destroy the city and temple, in case the nation of the Jews persisted in opposition to him: but the apostles did not understand till long after, that the Mosaic law was to be abrogated; so that this was their inference from his doctrine: and as the temple and city had before been destroyed, and yet the ritual law of Moses had not been altered; this inference was precarious, and their testimony false. (Marg. Ref. o—y.—Notes, Is. lxiv. 9—12. Jer. vii. 12—15. xxvi. 9. Dan. ix. 25—27. Mic. iii. 8—12. Zech. xi. 1—3. xiv. 3. Matt. xxvi. 57—62.) There was, however, no blasphemy in the words, if he had really spoken them; for they were literally verified a few years after, according to predictions of the ancient prophets, and the types of the law itself, when rightly understood, as well as the predictions of our Lord.  V. 15. When the members of the council stedfastly looked on Stephen, to observe whether he shewed any signs of guilt or terror, they saw his countenance calm and serene and irradiated, probably in a miraculous manner, as the face of Moses had been when he came down from the mount; so that he appeared more like an angel, than a man, as he stood before them. But, as they disregarded all the other miracles, so they remained unmoved even by this divine attestation to his character. It is remarkable, that he who was accused of blaspheming against Moses, should, in the presence of those who "sat in Moses's seat," be thus honoured; even as that lawgiver had been, when he came down from the mount of God. (Marg. Ref. Ex. xxxiv. 29—35. 2 Cor. iii. 7—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—7.

Unless partial and carnal self-love could be wholly destroyed out of every heart; envies, murmurs, jealousies, and discontents will creep in, and, in some degree, disturb every community on earth, however collected and governed. We need not then be surprised to find such things: they belong to human nature: apostolick administration could not wholly exclude them; and that, even among persons endued with great grace. It is indeed, exceedingly difficult to exclude gross evils, even where the most of those concerned are earnestly desirous of doing it. And as it is not to be expected, that the administration of affairs, either in nations, or in any part of the visible church, will be conducted with apostolick disinterestedness, wisdom, and sanctity; the subject before us may serve to repress our murmurs against governors, and established authorities, though we cannot cordially approve of their measures: for unreasonable expectations always end in bitter disappointments.—We should, however, repress the first risings of selfish passions in our own hearts; and endeavour to pre-

CHAP. VII.

Stephen, being required to answer before the council, shews how God called Abraham, and promised Canaan to him and his seed, 1—8; how Joseph was sold by his brethren, and Jacob with his family went down into Egypt, 9—16; that when they were oppressed by the Egyptians, Moses was born, and brought up by Pharaoh's daughter, 17—22; that attempting to deliver Israel he was rejected, and fled into Midian, 23—29; that at length he was sent to be their deliverer, 30—36; that he prophesied of Christ, received the law for Israel, and was grieved by their rebellion and idolatry, 37—43; that they had "the tabernacle of witness," till Solomon built the temple, 44—47; yet, according to the prophets, "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands," 48—50.

vent them in others, or to remove all occasions of them from others as far as we can: and, if they begin to appear, such concessions and regulations should be made without delay, as may disappoint that enemy, who thus seeks to divide the house and kingdom against itself. (Notes, Matt. xii. 25, 26. Gal. v. 13—15.) In general the ministers of Christ should leave to other men, as far as they can, the management of secular concerns, even such as belong to the church, or to charitable institutions; that they may keep clear of all suspicion of partiality or injustice, and be more at leisure, and unencumbered in attending to their proper office. But, if it be unreasonable and sinful for them to "leave the word of God," even to superintend the care of the poor, and those secular concerns which have an intimate connexion with piety and charity: how inexcusable must they be, who leave the publick ministry, and even the care of the poor and sick, to others, and waste their times in dissipated pleasures, luxurious indulgence, ambitious and covetous pursuits, or such studies, as are foreign to the clerical profession! or who spend their time, abilities, and zeal, in political disputes!—If men are not qualified even "to serve tables," or regulate charities, except they be of "honest report," and endued with heavenly wisdom and grace: how pernicious must it be, to commit the important trust of "watching for men's souls" to such persons, as are evidently destitute of these endowments! It therefore behoves those, who are concerned in choosing, appointing, or ordaining men to any office in the church, to do it with good advice, serious deliberation, and fervent prayer for divine direction. (Notes, 1 Tim. v. 21, 22. 24, 25.)—When proper methods have been taken to prevent disputes, and to preserve the peace of the church, and to secure an upright, impartial, and prudent management of all her concerns; and when pastors are left at liberty, and are zealously willing "to give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word;" it may be expected that the cause of truth will gain ground, that the number of disciples will be multiplied, and that even the most prejudiced will be won over to embrace the gospel: and when priests, or teachers, or leading persons, who have been blind, prejudiced, or careless, "become obedient to the faith;" it may be considered as a peculiar triumph of divine grace, and a most important advantage to the church.

He boldly accuses the council and the nation of imitating the rebellion and persecution of their ancestors, who rejected and slew the prophets; and charges them with murdering Christ, in violation of their own law, 51—53. Being "cut to the heart," they hasten to stone him; while he, favoured with a vision of Christ, and calling on him to receive his soul, and pardon his murderers, falls asleep, 54—60.

V. 8—15.

Those who are full of faith will be full of power; not indeed for working miracles, but to resist temptations, to endure hardships, and to perform arduous services: (Notes, Heb. xi) and, when the Saviour calls men forth to contend earnestly for the truth; he "will give them a mouth and wisdom, which all their enemies shall not be able to gainsay or resist." But worldly disputants, when thus disconcerted, commonly have recourse to other weapons, to defend their errors and to gratify their deep resentment. In ordinary cases, ridicule and abuse may suffice: but when enmity to the gospel concurs with indignation at being defeated in a vain-glorious contest, a more base and injurious method of revenge will frequently be devised.—How irrational a creature is man! To assert, that an intelligent being is capable of deliberately supporting a system of religion, by subornation, perjury, lying testimony, and murder, might have been deemed a libel on human nature, and on reason itself, had it not been done in numberless instances. But the blame rests not on the understanding, so much as on the heart, of a fallen creature, "which is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." (Note, Jer. xvii. 9, 10.)—Those who prefer human traditions and reasonings to divine revelation, will frequently charge those with blasphemy, who "speak according to the oracles of God:" and most injurious false testimony is often borne, through prejudiced conclusions from men's words, or wrong constructions put on them. But the servant of the Lord, possessing a clear conscience, a cheerful hope, and divine consolations, may smile in the face of danger and death; and may appear amidst his most furious persecutors, not only as "a lamb in the midst of wolves," but even as an angel surrounded with malignant demons.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—8. (Marg. Ref. a.) This speech of Stephen may be considered, either as an answer to the accusation brought against him, or as his testimony to Jesus Christ: and the same arguments would serve both purposes. As he was not permitted to conclude; so we have here rather an introduction to his main subject, than the whole of his intended discourse. (Notes, 51—53. xvii. 3C 31. xxiv. 24—27. xxvi. 24—32.)—There was peculiar wis-

4 Then ⁱ came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell.

5 And ^k he gave him none inheritance in it, no, ^l not so much as to set his foot on: ^m yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, ⁿ when as yet he had no child.

6 And God spake on this wise, ^o That his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat ^p them evil ^q four hundred years.

7 And ^r the nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God: and after that, shall they come forth, ^s and serve me in this place.

8 And he gave him ^t the covenant of circumcision. ^u And so Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; ^v and Isaac begat Jacob; ^w and Jacob begat the twelve ^x patriarchs.

10 And ^b delivered him out of all his afflictions, ^c and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and he made him governor over Egypt and all his house.

11 Now ^d there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Canaan, and great affliction: and our fathers found no sustenance.

dom in referring to the ancient records of the nation, and in speaking honourably of those characters, for which his hearers professed so great a veneration, and so strong an attachment; though they neither understood the general plan of the Lord's dealings with their ancestors, nor entered into their views, nor copied their examples. The animation and beauty of the address must be, in a great measure, lost to us, unless we could place ourselves exactly in the situation of the Jews, and appropriate, as it were, their peculiar sentiments and feelings on these subjects. Stephen was accused of predicting the abrogation of the ceremonial law, as if the intimation of such a change was blasphemous: whereas, in fact, the best and most eminent persons among their ancestors lived before the promulgation of that law; which could not therefore be essential to the acceptable worship of God. This seems to have been covertly insinuated, in the beginning of his discourse, which Stephen opened in the language of respect, deference, and affection. He observed, that "the God of glory," who is altogether glorious, and the Fountain of glory, and who had shewn his visible glory in the camp of Israel, in the tabernacle, and in the temple, first appeared to Abraham, not in Canaan, to which they thought his peculiar presence limited, but in Mesopotamia. (Notes, Gen. xi. 26—32. xii. 1—3. Josh. xxiv. 2. Heb. xi. 8—10.)—As the history has already been considered, I shall here only advert to those things, which involve difficulty, or form an essential part of Stephen's argument. (Marg. Ref.) Both "Ur of the Chaldees," and Charran, or Haran, were, properly speaking, in Mesopotamia; though Haran was much nearer to the promised land, than Ur was.—It is here peculiarly noticed, that, when the promise of Canaan to Abraham's posterity was given, he had neither any possession in the land, even so much as to be able to set his foot down, except on the land of others; nor had he any children to inherit, if he had had any possession (5).—From the calling of Abram, to the Exodus, or departure out of Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. Twenty-five elapsed before Isaac was born; and tradition reports that he was five years old when weaned, and when Ishmael, who was of Egyptian extraction by his mother, mocked him. The apostle considers this as a species of persecution, and many date these four hundred years from that event. (Notes, Gen. xv. 12—16. xxi. 8—12. Ex. xii. 40.)—"The covenant of circumcision," is that covenant, which was sealed by circumcision, above four hundred years before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. V. 9—13. Joseph was the peculiar favourite of God, and an eminent type of Jesus; yet his brethren hated and envied him: but they were not able to prevent his exaltation, which was the means of their own preservation. The argument of this passage seems to be, that, as the pa triarchs must have perished, if Joseph, whom they had envied and injured, had not been advanced to authority, and thus enabled to preserve them; so must the Jews and their rulers perish, unless Jesus, whom they had despised and crucified, but whom God had highly exalted, should graciously save them. As therefore Joseph's brethren at length submitted to him, and were forgiven; so ought they to submit, and seek forgiveness from the glorified Messiah. (*Marg. V. 14. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. xlvi. 7. 12. 15. 21. 27.) Seventy persons, including Jacob and Joseph, and Joseph's two sons, are reckoned up by Moses; among whom were some grand-children of Benjamin, who was not above twenty-five years of age, when Jacob went down into Egypt. And several grand-children of Joseph are named in Chronicles, who are not mentioned in Genesis. (1 Chr. vii. 16. 20.) It is undeniable, that some of the grand-children of Jacob's sons, who afterwards became heads of families in their tribes, were included in the number stated by Moses: and is it not the most obvious way of settling the difficulty, between his account, and that of Stephen from the Septuagint, to include five grand-children of Joseph? Some learned men indeed would make up the number, by the wives of the patriarchs: but it must have been very extraordinary at least that, with so many sons and grandsons, there should have been no more than five women! and, if there were many more, why should five only be here added to the number? Only two females (Dinah, and Serah, a descendant of Gad,) are mentioned in Genesis: and the Septuagint, which Stephen, (who probably was a Grecian, Notes, vi. 2—6,) seems to have referred to, may be thus translated: "All the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, who came out of his loins, apart from the wives of Jacob's sons, all the souls were threescore and six. But the sons of Joseph, who were born to him in the land of Egypt, were nine. All the souls of the house of Jacob, who went down with Jacob into Egypt, were threescore and fifteen souls."—Joseph, and his two sons, and Jacob himself, complete the threescore and ten of our version: and though the Septuagint is not very accurate, or perspicuous in this statement, three things are sufficiently clear: 1. That the additional

of the sons of ^o Emmor, the father of ^o Sychem. Gen. xxiv. 2. &c. Hamor. Shechem.

17 ¶ But ^p when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, ^q the people grew and multiplied in Egypt, p 6. Gen. xv. 13 -15. 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9. q xiii. 17. Ex. 7—12. 20. Ps. cv. 24.

18 Till ^r another king arose, which ^r knew not Joseph. r Ex. i. 8.

five mentioned in it were not women. In fact with what propriety could the wives of Jacob's sons be said to come out of his loins? 2. That they were sons, or male descendants, of Joseph. And, 3. That the family of Jacob, containing some born in Egypt, and Joseph who was carried thither long before, as well as Jacob and those who went down with him, are included.—'Reckoning some of the children born in Egypt, together with Joseph and his sons, and his sons' sons, made up seventy-five persons.' Hammond.

V. 15, 16. (Notes, Gen. xlvi—xlix.) It appears from this passage, and it is indeed highly probable in itself, and confirmed by ancient tradition, that the bodies of all Jacob's sons were embalmed, and carried up by their descendants, to be interred in Canaan. (Notes, Gen. i. 24—26.) Jacob was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, with his fathers, Abraham and Isaac. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 29—31. i. 1—14.) This Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite. (Notes, Gen. xxiii.) But Joseph, and probably his brethren, were buried at Sychem, or Shechem, in the piece of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Emmor, or Hamor, the father of Shechem; and which he left as an inheritance to the descendants of Joseph. "Jacob died, he and our fathers, and they" (our fathers) "were carried over to Sychem and buried, he" (that is Jacob,) "in the sepulchre which Abraham bought for a sum of money; and they" (the other patriarchs,) "in that of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem." This rendering has been proposed by several eminent men, to remove the obvious difficulty of reconciling the passage with the history in the book of Genesis. (Gen. xxxiii. 19. Notes, Gen. xlviii. 22. Josh. xxiv. 29—32, v. 32.) But it is rather a paraphrase, than a translation; and not a fair paraphrase of the present text.—'Or we must say, with the great Bochart, that some unskilful grammarian, thinking that a nominative case was wanting before the word ωνησατο, was bought, wrote in the margin the word Αβρααμ, Abraham, which others put in the text, without which the words run thus, with exact truth. "So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died" (there), "he and our father; and they" (our fathers) "were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre, that was bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem." Whitby.

V. 17—29. (Marg. Ref. p, q. s.—Notes, Gen. xv. 12—15. Ex. i. 1—22.) The words here rendered, "exceeding fair," are literally, "fair to God," (Marg.) which some have rendered, "Beloved by God;" but this is not a just translation. Neither is there any ground to conclude, either that Moses prophesied, as some have supposed, or indeed had true faith and graec, till a short time before he visited his brethren. (Marg. Ref. b, e.—Note, Heb. xi. 24—26.) The clause “fair to God,” seems to refer to the Lord's purposes concerning Moses, which induced him to preserve him, when other children were destroyed; and by means of his extraordinary beauty to accomplish this. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, Ex. ii. 2—10. Heb. xi. 23.)—Moses might be “mighty in words,” as capable of calm, foreible, and conclusive reasoning; and yet be slow of speech, and destitute of the graces of elocution, as he modestly pleaded concerning himself. (Notes, Ex. iv. 10—12.)—He had received some general intimation, that he should deliver his people; (as David was assured that he should reign over Israel;) but it does not appear, that he was expressly commissioned to attempt their deliverance at this time. From some general computation, it is probable that he supposed the appointed time was at hand; but forty years more must elapse, before that event actually took place. He also concluded, that when so distinguished a person, as he had been in Pharaoh's court, renounced all his prospects, to join interests with his enslaved people, as the deliverer whom God had raised up; they too, remembering the prediction and promise to Abraham, would readily attach themselves to him: but in this he found himself mistaken. (Marg. Ref. x—l.—Notes, Ex. ii. 11—15. Heb. xi. 24—27.)—The speech of this single person is represented (35), as expressing the sentiments of the whole body of the people: as their slowness afterwards to believe the mission of Moses, when attested by miracles, seems evidently to shew that it was. (Doddridge. (Note, Luke xii. 13, 14.)—Stranger. (29) Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Ex. ii. 16—21.)

but the "Angel JEHOVAH," the Angel or Messenger of the covenant, the Word and Son of God, by whom he has always been declared unto men. (Notes, Mal. iii. 1-4, v. 1. John i. 18.) But it only implies the distinct personality of the Father and the Son; and that the Son, having undertaken to become incarnate, always was the medium of communication between the invisible God and sinful man: and though he often appeared in human form, yet was he "the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob;" being One with and equal to the Father. (Marg. Ref. p-t.—Notes, Matt. xxii. 23-33, v. 32. Phil. ii. 5-11.) Moses was ordered to put off his shoes, and the priests under the law are supposed to have ministered barefoot in the sanctuary: as no shoes or sandals are mentioned, though particualar orders are given about all the other garments. This was an expression of reverence, and an emblem of circumspection. (Notes, Ex. iii. 4, 5. Josh. v. 13-15.)—The example of the Israelites, refusing the help of Moses, was suited to shew the Jews, that it was no new thing for their nation to reject those, whom God had sent to rule over and deliver them; and therefore it was the less wonderful, that they had rejected and crucified their promised Messiah.—(Marg. Ref. y-g.) 'It would be too frigid an interpretation to say that the Lord called Moses by the ministration of an angel; when, (unless I am deceived,) this 'also is signified, that Moses was armed by his hand and

V. 37-43. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h-o.—Notes, iii. 22-26. Deut. xviii. 15-22.) Moses had predicted, that God would raise up a Prophet like to him in Israel, to whom the people were commanded to hearken, even in preference to him; and it might be expected, that this Prophet would change some at least of the externals appointed by him. (Notes, vi. 9-14. Matt. xvii. 5-8.) The Jews whom Stephen addressed, professed a strong attachment to Moses; yet their fathers, even after he had brought them out of Egypt, and when they were daily witnessing the most stupendous miracles, which God wrought by him, were by no means submissive to him. For even "this Moses," for whom they were about to reject the Messiah, when in the church, or congregation, of Israel in the wilderness, attended by the manifested presence of the great "Angel of the covenant," even JEHOVAH, who spake to him from Sinai, and from whom he received those lively oracles, or revelations of the divine will, which contained the way of salvation and eternal life, could not secure their obedience to his authority: on the contrary, they thrust him from them, desired to return to Egyptian bondage, and seduced Aaron to make the golden calf, in contempt of Moses and of the LORD. (Marg. Ref. p—u.—Notes, Ex. xxxii—xxxiv. Neh. ix. 15—17, v. 17.) This had been an earnest and specimen of their subsequent idolatries in after ages, to which God judicially gave them up, till at length he sentenced the nation to captivity under the Assyrians and Chaldeans. (Marg. Ref. x—e.—Note, Am. v. 25—27.)—The name Remphan is here substituted for Chim in Amos; but little satisfactory has been advanced concerning the demon, or planet, worshipped under this name.—Some conclude from the clause, "took up the tabernacle of Moloch," that shrines of Moloch, or models of the idol-temple and image within it, were publicly carried in procession by the worshippers. (Note, xix. 23—31.) This however Moses would not allow so long as he lived. They therefore suppose, that God, as a punishment of the idolatry of Israel, in worshipping him under the image of the golden calf, at length gave up the nation to still more open and atrocious idolatry; till they had filled up the measure of their crimes, and were sent into captivity, into Chaldaea, Media, and still more distant regions. Many intimations, however, are given by the prophets, that gross idolatries were secretly practised, even in the wilderness. (Notes, Ez. xx. 10—17.)—Stephen observed that this had been the conduct of their ancestors in all former ages, and the Jews had no cause to glory in them: God had before given up the nation to idolatry and captivity; and they had no reason to confide in present external privileges, but rather to fear the terrible judgments of God for crucifying the Messiah. And, as the prophets had formerly predicted the Assyrian and Babylonish captivity, which had come to pass accordingly; so they had no cause to condemn him for predicting the approaching ruin of their city, temple, and nation, if they persisted to oppose the religion of Jesus.—Lively oracles. (38) The law, as given by Moses, considered in itself, was "the ministration of death;" but as connected with the types, prophecies, and instituted ordinances, which contained the substance of the gospel, under that dispensation, the way of life eternal was pointed out, and known in a measure by all true believers: and in this sense, even the books of Moses were "living oracles," a revelation by which numbers obtained eternal life, through faith in him of whom Moses in the law, as well as all the subsequent prophets bore witness.—Make us gods. (40) Exactly from the LXX, Ex. xxxii. 1. V. 44—50. After the giving of the law, the Israelites had worshipped God, not in Canaan, nor at Jerusalem, but in the wilderness; and not at a stately temple, but a moveable tabernacle. This was carried into the promised land by their fathers, under the leading of Jesus, or Joshua; (the type of Jesus the Messiah;) and, as it witnessed the gracious presence of God with them, and their relation to him, being typical of good things to come, which appeared by the injunction given to Moses about forming it; (Note, Ex. xxv. 40;) so it answered the same purposes, for several hundred years, after their settlement in Canaan. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f—l.) And though David, having been highly favoured and prospered, desired greatly to build a temple; (Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 1—16. Ps. cxxxii. 1—6;) he was only allowed to make preparation for it; because he had been a warrior, and had shed blood: and therefore the building of the temple was reserved for Solomon, his peaceable son, who was an eminent type of the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, 1 Chr. xxii. 1—12. xxix. 1—19.) Yet when Solomon had finished his magnificent edifice, he considered it merely as a symbol of the Lord's merciful presence with his true worshippers, and not as a real habitation for the Deity; as if JEHOVAH must needs continue his regard to it and the people, however they behaved: and the language of their prophets, as well as the Babylonish captivity, should have taught the Jews to expect, that the temple would be destroyed, whenever their presumption and rebellion provoked God to turn against them, and be their enemy. (Notes, 1 Kings viii. 27. ix. 3—9. Is. lxvi. 1, 2. Jer. vii. 1—15.) The chosen race, Abraham and his seed, had served God above four hundred years, before the law of Moses was promulgated, or the tabernacle erected; and Solomon's temple was not built till four hundred and eighty years afterwards. So that nearly half the time, from the calling of Abraham till the coming of the Messiah, the true worshippers had served God, without the temple: and could those things be essential to true religion, which had not existed during so many ages?—The tabernacle of witness. (44) Thus the LXX. translate the Hebrew words, which may signify "the tabernacle of meeting;" namely, the place where the congregation assembled, where they hoped to meet God with acceptance, and where he had appointed to meet them.—Heaven, &c. (49, 50) The quotation is not made exactly from the LXX; (Is. lxvi. 1, 2;) and it varies both from that and the Hebrew; by putting the last clause as a question: "Hath not?" 'As Stephen had been accused 'of blaspheming the temple; he, with great propriety, 'takes occasion to speak of their sacred places with due 'reverence, as raised by special direction from God; and 'yet corrects that extravagant regard to them, and confidence in them, which the Jews were ready to entertain.' Doddridge.

V. 51—53. It is conjectured with great probability, that the council, perceiving the scope of Stephen's discourse, and the conclusions which he was about to draw from it in favour of the gospel, as condemning their conduct, and justifying his own doctrine, grew so tumultuous, and shewed such indications of anger and impatience, that he found he should not be allowed to bring his argument to a regular conclusion. He was therefore emboldened and influenced by the Holy Spirit, to apply it in few words, but in the terms of most severe reproof, to the consciences of his furious and malignant judges. He addressed them as an obstinate untractable people, who rested in the outward sign of circumcision, while their hearts were closed by pride, enmity, and unbelief against the truth of God. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Lev. xxvi. 41, 42. Deut. x. 16. xxx. 1—10, v. 6. Jer. iv. 3, 4. ix. 25, 26. Rom. ii. 25—29.) Indeed, to resist the Holy Spirit, by rejecting the testimony of inspired prophets, and fighting against them, and him that spake by them, and by sinning in defiance of convictions, had always characterized the nation. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, Is. lxiii. 10. Heb. x. 28—31.) Thus their fathers had done in every age: they had opposed and persecuted the prophets, almost without exception, from Moses to Jeremiah, who foretold the captivity; and Ezekiel, and those that arose afterwards; who all, in one way or other, foretold the coming of that righteous Saviour and King, whom they had now traiterously delivered up to Pilate, and thus most basely murdered. (Marg. Ref. b—e.—Notes, Matt. xxiii. 34—39. Luke xi. 46—54.) They had indeed received the law, as given to Moses on mount Sinai, by JEHOVAH, amidst ranks of attendant and worshipping angels: and they were proud of that distinction. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Gal. iii. 19—22. Heb. ii. 1—4.) But they had never applied their minds to understand, observe, or obey it, in its spiritual meaning, and with reference to "Christ, the end of the law for righteousness to every believer." (Note, Rom. x. 1—4.)—The supposition before mentioned is the more probable, as Stephen began his defence in the most calm and respectful language, and touched on such topics, as were suited to conciliate and gain the attention of the audience: but nothing can well exceed the marked severity of his conclusion. Had it not been expressly stated that he was "full of the Holy Ghost," when he spake it, many would have been ready to censure him: but probably he was sensible, that the council were determined on his death, out of desperate enmity to his Lord; and he was moved to bear this awful testimony against them, and thus to warn them against that destruction, which they were about to bring upon themselves; without further respect to their rank, or fear of their vengeance; but not without tender compassion for their souls, as his dying prayer evinced. 'Stephen, fired with 'a divine zeal, at length judges those who sat in judgment on him.' Beza.—The crucifixion of Christ was the most flagrant violation of the sixth commandment, which ever was committed: and if David, having shed blood in war, or even having shed the blood of Uriah, must not build the temple; could it be supposed that the temple would be continued to those, who had shed the blood of the prophets, and filled up the measure of their crimes by "crucifying the Lord of glory?"

V. 54—60. (Note, v. 33—39.) The conclusion of Stephen’s address enraged the malignant rulers even to madness; and they seemed like beasts of prey, who were about to devour him: they not only were cut in their hearts, as with a saw, but they gnashed their teeth with fury and anguish. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Note, Matt. viii. 10—12.) Stephen, however, was not in the least intimidated by their fury: for, looking up to heaven as appealing to God, and being filled with the Holy Spirit, he was favoured with an extraordinary vision, as the ancient prophets had been. (Notes, Is. vi. 1—4. Jer. xxxi. 23—26. Ez. i. 1—3. viii. 1—4. xi. 22—25. 2 Cor. xii. 1—6. Rev. i. 9—11.) In this vision he saw a display of glory, which denoted the presence of God, and Jesus as Mediator “standing at his right hand,” that is, in the place of pre-eminent dignity and authority. On other occasions, Jesus is spoken of as “sitting on his throne:” (Notes, Ps. cx. 1. Dan. vii. 13, 14. Matt. xxii. 41—46. Rom. viii. 32—34. Col. iii. 1—4, v. 1. Heb. xii. 2, 3. 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22:) but here he appeared standing, to signify his readiness to plead the cause, and receive the soul, of his suffering disciple. Immediately Stephen proclaimed aloud before his enraged enemies, what a glorious scene was now opened to his view: but they, treating it as blasphemy, or determined to hear nothing further, stopped their ears, furiously ran upon him, hurried him out of the city, and stoned him to death. (Marg. Ref. k—t.—Note, Matt. xxvi. 63—68.) The witnesses, who had accused him of blasphemous words, being required to begin the execution, laid down their clothes at the feet of Saul. (Note, Deut. xvii. 2—7.) As he was a native of Cilicia, (vi. 9. xxii. 3,) he had probably heard, or even taken part in, the preceding disputation with Stephen; and thus, the first time we read of this most eminent apostle, we find him consenting and accessory to the death of the first martyr for the faith of Christ!—(Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, viii. 1. xxii. 17—21.)—At length Stephen invoked his incarnate Lord, and committed his departing soul into his hands, in nearly the same words which Jesus had used in addressing the Father,

57 Then ^a they cried out with a loud voice, and ^b stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord,

58 And ^c cast him out of the city, and stoned him: ^d and the witnesses laid down ^e their clothes at a young man’s feet, whose name was Saul.

59 And they stoned Stephen, ^f calling upon God, and saying, ^g Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.

60 And ^h he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, ⁱ Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this ^j he fell asleep.

when he expired on the cross. (Luke xxiii. 46. Note, Ps. xxxi. 5.) He also calmly kneeled down; and amidst the agonies of this violent death, he copied his Lord’s example when he prayed for his crucifiers; beseeching him, not to charge the guilt of this atrocious murder to those who perpetrated it; not to place it to their account; not to impute it to them, but to forgive it: (Marg. Ref. y—b.—Notes, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2. Rom. iv. 6—8. Luke xxiii. 32—38, v. 34 :) and having spoken these words he expired, with the composure of one who falls asleep. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, 1 Thes. iv. 13—18.)—The early loss of so eminent a minister of Christ, in this manner, must indeed have been a heavy affliction to the church: but how animated was his end! how suited to confirm the faith of the disciples! What an example also were his boldness and his tenderness, even for his murderers! The instruction and encouragement of this single scene might produce the most beneficial effects on multitudes, and that permanently; even far greater, than the long continued labours of many eminent ministers. Such in general has been the event of bloody persecution; and ‘the noble army of martyrs’ have done more, perhaps, towards the success of the gospel, by their sharp but transient sufferings, than the whole company of those who have professed and preached the truth, in quiet times; and without being called forth, thus to shew, in the fiery trial, the energy of their principles, and the power of divine grace, to the confusion of their enemies, and the encouragement of their brethren.—The prayer of Stephen was a most direct act of divine worship rendered to Jesus, appearing in human nature, as the Son of man, and attended by a vision of the glory of God. The word God does not occur in the original. To receive a departing soul to glory, and to pardon the guilt of most aggravated murder, are acts of divine power and authority; and it would be evidently most unreasonable, as well as unscriptural, to make such requests to any mere creature, whether present, or absent. (Note, Matt. ix. 2—8.) Indeed the Socinians are most grievously perplexed by this undeniable fact: after many other attempts to evade our inference from it, in which they have been evidently baffled in the argument; some very learned men have lately ventured to say, ‘that the example of a man, in an ecstasy of devotion, and in the agonies of death, is not proper to be imitated by the whole church of God.’ As if modern reasoners could better direct our faith and practice, than this apostolical Protomartyr, when "full of the Holy Ghost," when immediately favoured "with the visions of God," and when replete with the very light, joy, and temper of heaven itself!—And let it here be observed, that we bring a very large number of positive evidences, to support the truth of this doctrine. If then objectors make very feeble efforts to invalidate the testimony of each of them, considered as detached from the rest, so that each still evinces the point in question; how very powerful must be the combined proof of the whole! For if twenty, or forty, or more, such texts were expunged out of the Bible, we should not want sufficient, yea, unanswerable evidence of the Deity of Christ.—It is here also enquired, By what authority did the Jewish council put Stephen to death? In the case of Jesus, they allowed, that they had no such authority: and it is probable that their situation was still the same. (Note, John xviii. 28—32.) Had they proceeded to pass a legal sentence on Stephen, they would perhaps have obtained permission from Pilate to execute it: but they stoned him in a popular fury, without any regular sentence; and the governor might choose to connive at it, as he did at some of their subsequent persecutions. (Notes, viii. 1—4. ix. 1, 2.) 'The Jews were more than once ready to stone Christ, not only when by their own confession they had not power to put any one to death; but when nothing had passed which had the shadow of a legal trial. (John viii. 59. x. 31. xviii. 31.)' Doddridge.—When the Jews would afterwards have put Paul to death, the chief captain and the governor hindered them: yet, if he had been killed, it is not unlikely that the irregularity would have been connived at, had it not been discovered that he was a Roman citizen. The sceptre, however, was gradually departing from Judah; and the Romans continually entrenched, more and more, upon the authority of the high priest and council, till the whole was subverted; for Shiloh was come, and now the gathering of the people was to Him. (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.)—'If the spirit of a man died with his body, no reason can be given, why St. Stephen should pray to the Lord Jesus to "receive his spirit," rather than his body.' Whitby. (*Notes, John xiv. 2, 3. 2 Cor. v. 5—8. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

We should be ready to "give a reason of the hope that is in us," to enquirers of every description: this ought indeed to be done in meekness, and with cautious fear of disgracing a cause, which should be dearer to us than our lives; but we may confidently rely on the Lord to "give us in the same hour what we should speak," if called to answer for ourselves before the enemies of his truth. (Notes, Matt. x. 19, 20. 1 Pet. iii. 13—16.)—Whatever bold and faithful application we may intend or be led to make, of the doctrines which we inculcate, we should always speak with evident benevolence: and it is proper to render civil respect and honour even to those superiors, against whose usurped or abused authority we are constrained to protest.—In all addresses to those who allow the truth of the scriptures, we should call their attention to them, lodge our appeal with them, and thence deduce our arguments.—It is very lawful and expedient to express approbation of men's opinions, as far as consistent with truth, and even to avoid the mention of their more harmless prejudices; in order that we may reason with them from their own principles, and so oppose their erroneous conclusions and evil practices.—It is also profitable to recur to the first rise of those usages or sentiments, which have been warped or perverted.—Would we know the nature and effects of justifying faith, we should study the character of "the father of the faithful." "The God of glory," to whom he had been a stranger, called him to leave his country and friends: he 'through grace obeyed the calling;' and from that time he walked with God, as his friend and worshipper. This may teach us the efficacy and freeness of divine grace, the nature of conversion, and the way to follow the Lord in faith and hope, and to wait for the fulfilment of his promises in humble patience. Here too we may see, that external forms and distinctions (though idolized by numbers,) are of small value, compared with dependence, submission, obedience, separation from the world, and devotedness to God.—The promised seed are sojourners in a strange land; their inheritance is in reversion, and must be waited for; they will be evil entreated in this world, and they should leave it to God to judge their oppressors. Our deliverance from the bondage of sin and Satan, is an introduction to our serving the Lord according to his word: and, though the external seals are not always posterior, in time, to the grace of the covenant, they are in all cases of immensely inferior importance, and only valuable as in one way or other subservient to it: yet exact obedience in these and all other things is our bounden duty.

V. 9—29.

Those whom God most favours will often be envied and injured, even by those who are of reputation in the visible church. But though the troubles of the righteous man seem grievous and tedious; "the LORD delivereth him out of them all:" and wisdom, favour, and preferment are given by God alone. He often renders the most despised persons the instruments of saving those who contemned them; even as the insulted and crucified apostles, having preached in the cities of Samaria, return to Jerusalem, 25. Philip is sent by an angel into the desert of Gaza, 26; where he meets with a eunuch, treasurer of Candace queen of Ethiopia, returning in his chariot from Jerusalem, and reading the prophecy of Isaiah, 27, 28. By a divine monition he joins the chariot, and preaches Jesus to the Ethiopian, 29—35; who, professing faith in him as “the Son of God,” is baptized, 36—38. The Spirit conveys away Philip, who preaches in the cities on the sea-coast, till he comes to Cesarea: and the eunuch returns home rejoicing, 39, 40.

Jesus was “exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness to Israel.”—All the promises of God will be accomplished in due season, and nothing can retard or hasten that appointed time.—Every earthly friend may fail, or requite our services with black ingratitude; but the Lord will not forsake his people.—In the darkest times of persecution, when treachery and cruelty have combined to destroy the church, the most eminent instruments of its deliverance have been raised up: and when peculiar services are to be performed, God furnishes his servants with suitable qualifications, and sometimes by means of those aliens, against whom they are destined to be employed.—Very useful persons have lived, for many years, among the enemies of God, and have possessed authority, wealth, or reputation in the world: but when he “puts it into their hearts” to join themselves to him and his people; they readily renounce these advantages, and endure reproach, hardship, and affliction for his sake.—Difficulties and perils await the believer, not only from open enemies, but from false or heartless brethren: and they, by whose hands the most extraordinary services have been performed, have found, often during many years, that the people did not understand the Lord’s intentions respecting them.—Those who are doing wrong are generally most impatient of rebuke: and Jesus himself is rejected as a Ruler and a Judge, because his commands and decisions run counter to men’s lusts and iniquities.—He who labours to persuade the professed people of God, to cease from their disgraceful and pernicious contests with each other, is generally exposed to reproach from those, who especially are most evidently criminal, as if he wanted to usurp authority not belonging to him.—But though men thus prolong their own miseries; the Lord will take care of his servants, and compass his own designs of mercy: and years of retired contemplation, devotion, and humble industry, are as useful to his servants, as those spent in a learned education, or in the active scenes of life: while a humble willingness to labour in obscurity, after having shone in more publick stations, is a happy indication of heavenly wisdom and genuine magnanimity. (Note, Ex. ii. 21. P. O. 11—25. Note, iii. 11.)

V. 30—43.

The best of men have cause to stand in awe, and even to tremble, in the presence of God; though, in infinite condescension, he is pleased to dwell in his church, as in a burning bush; to put honour on it, notwithstanding its meanness; and to preserve it amidst its fiery trials. (Note, Ex. iii. 2. P. O. 1—6.) He sees the affliction and hears the groaning of his people under distresses, oppressions, and persecutions; yea, he often sends his ministers to rescue sinners, when they are disposed to reject them.—If we would have Jesus for a Deliverer, we must submit to him as a Ruler, and wait for him as a Judge; else we shall perish with the Egyptians, and not be saved with the Israelites. He is the great “Angel of the covenant,” who brings his people from bondage, through the wilderness to their promised rest; and all the scenes exhibited in Egypt, at the Red Sea, at Sinai, and in Canaan, shadowed forth his excellences and his glorious salvation. But as Israel thrust Moses from them, and purposed to return to their bondage; so men in general will not obey Jesus, because they love this present evil world: and any kind of false religion, or irreligion, however absurd, by which men rejoice in their own works and imaginations, is more suitable to the carnal mind, than the spiritual truth and worship set before us in the sacred scriptures. (Notes, Ex. xxxii. 1—6. P. O. 1—14.) On this account, God is provoked to give men up to their lusts and delusions, and so they fill up their measure of sin, and perish without remedy.

V. 44—60.

Every review of the history of the world, of the church, or of our own hearts and lives, tends to “exclude boasting,” and to cover us with shame: and the whole scripture proclaims man to be a proud ungrateful rebel against God. He works by various means and instruments, and men are almost universally guilty of neglecting or of idolizing them. But as heaven is his throne and the earth his “footstool,” none of our services can profit him, who “made all these things:” and next to the human Nature of Christ, the broken and spiritual heart is his most valued temple. (Note, Is. lvii. 15, 16.)—The plainest arguments, and the most incontestable facts, only irritate those, whose interests and passions have engaged them against the truth: and it is proper, that they should be shewn, in the most explicit manner, their guilt and danger, who with determined obstinacy “resist the Holy Spirit;” who are ‘baptized infidels;’ who tread in the steps of those that betrayed and murdered the just and gracious Saviour; and who habitually violate those very precepts, which they substitute in the place of his righteousness and atonement.—The application is generally the most useful, and often the most offensive, part of a discourse; without which the rest will make but a transient impression: but when sinners are convicted, and not humbled, they will be exasperated; and the greatest wisdom and grace cannot mollify them.—Though we are not favoured with prophetic visions, we may by faith stedfastly fix our thoughts and affections on heavenly things: thus we shall see the glory of God, and Jesus ever appearing in the Father’s presence for us, enthroned in power, pleading our cause, and prepared to help us in all our distresses, and at last to receive our departing souls. We must not then refuse to confess his name, to declare his glory, and to avow our obligations to him, even in the presence of his most furious enemies. If we be called to suffer for his sake, we should the more earnestly call on his name, to support us under our trials, and to bring us to his glory; never forgetting to beseech him to forgive and bless our enemies

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. The word “consenting,” is much too feeble: the original implies complacency, and cordial approbation. (Note, xxii. 17—21.)—As the rulers had compassed the death of Stephen, without exciting an insurrection of the people, or the resentment of the governor, they ventured to carry on the persecution with increasing violence.—The whole subsequent history shews, that a great number of believers continued at Jerusalem: though it is probable, that the most of those, who commonly resided in other countries, returned home at that time: and many others doubtless fled from the storm. But the preachers of the gospel were particularly aimed at, and were especially scattered. The apostles, however, though principally obnoxious, stood their ground: they were satisfied that their presence was still necessary at Jerusalem: and their enemies were so restrained or overawed, that they did not venture to assault them—though no doubt, they zealously and diligently laboured to promote the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a. f.—Notes, Neh. vi. 10—14. 1 Cor. xvi. 5—9, v. 9.)—“It is a very ancient ‘tradition ... that our Lord assigned twelve years after his ‘ascension, for the conversion of the unbelieving Jews in ‘Judea, ... saying to his apostles, Go ye out into the ‘world after twelve years. ... It shews the reason, why the ‘apostles continued at Jerusalem, while the rest of the ‘disciples were scattered abroad.’ Whitby. As the scripture says nothing of this, it is far more probable, especially after the command before given, (v. 20,) that the apostles, considering the importance of their station at this crisis, and the necessity of shewing both friends and enemies, that they were not to be intimidated; and, depending on special protection, acted as Daniel did on a similar occasion, and left the event to God. (Notes, Dan. vi.)—As the disciples had before lived in much harmony and comfort together; they would not perhaps have thought of separating so soon, if this storm had not arisen: thus the efforts of Satan and his servants were over-ruled for the promulgation of the gospel; while the apostles were competent for all the work which was to be done in Jerusalem, and the persecution would not prevent, but forward their success.

V. 2. Even in the prospect of this rising storm, some of the devoted servants of Christ ventured to give an honourable interment to the mangled body of Stephen; and to lament their own loss, and that of the church, in the premature removal of so able and faithful a minister, from whose continued labours so great things might have been expected. (Note, Is. lvii. 1, 2.) Thus honourably and publicly to bury one stoned by the council, as a blasphemer, and as such accursed, was a very courageous display of faith, zeal, and confidence in God. It must also have greatly offended the persecutors; and perhaps served as a pretence for their subsequent violence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Saul, having distinguished himself at Stephen’s martyrdom, was judged a suitable agent in the service of the persecutors; and he furiously engaged in it, like a savage tiger or wolf, making havock among the defenceless sheep!—The circumstance of Saul’s entering every house of the disciples, and dragging away, not only men, but women also, and casting them into prison, should be carefully noted. He “was exceedingly mad against them.”—Doubtless many were cut off at this time; yet Pilate seems to have connived at it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, vii. 54—60. ix. 1, 2. xxvi. 9—11.)

After so great an increase of the church, as had since that time taken place, it may well be supposed, that many had been set apart for the ministry before the martyrdom of Stephen. So that, even allowing that none were scattered, except the ministers;

(which is extremely improbable;) it is incongruous to limit the number in this manner.—‘There is no room to enquire where these poor refugees had their orders. They were endued with miraculous gifts; and if they had not been so, the extraordinary call they had to spread the knowledge of Christ, wherever they came, among those who were ignorant of him, would abundantly justify them in what they did.’ Doddridge.—Were then all the Christians endued with miraculous powers? or might none, who were not, declare, what they had seen and heard?—‘Some difference may perhaps be here observed between εὐαγγελιζεσθαι, ... and κηρυσσειν: ... not in respect of the matter of their preaching, but of the manner of it. The latter ... doth generally signify a publick solemn proclaiming of Christ, as when a ... herald or crier doth ... by way of office proclaim any thing: but the former imports no more, than the telling it, making it known; as good news is published, without the voice of a herald or crier, by all that have heard it, to all they meet with. ... Not that εὐαγγελιζεσθαι is never used of that publick, authoritative proclaiming; for it is sometimes used of the apostles: and the word ... Evangelist is the name of an office in the apostles’ times. ... But, I say, that sometimes, and particularly in this place, it may belong to whatsoever publishing the gospel of Christ; and by whomsoever, that is, by those who have no calling to it. For when the doctrine of Christ was first preached by the apostles, ... and a multitude of ... Jews and proselytes received the faith, and for doing so professedly, were presently persecuted and driven out of Jerusalem; it is not to be imagined, but that all, wheresoever they came, both men and women, published what they knew, both of the doctrine, and the miracles by which it was confirmed, and of their own sufferings for it. ... When of Philip, who was a deacon ... it is related, ... that “he preached Christ,” it follows that he baptized also.—But of these other disciples, there is no more said, but that they passed along ... publishing this good news, the gospel which they had received; but no mention of gathering disciples, or baptizing. Accordingly ... when there is mention ... of these very men, that being scattered by the persecution, ... they spake the word, or published the gospel, ... the phrase used is observable: (xi. 19. Gr. :) the word λαλειν being known to belong to any way of reporting, or relating, by talk or discourse. ... And upon the success of this, through God’s prospering hand, and many receiving the faith, it follows, that ... the church of Jerusalem ... sent Barnabas to visit and confirm them. ... Thus Apollos (xviii. 25) spake and taught exactly the things concerning the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.’ Hammond.—It appears to me, that the remarks contained in this quotation, are suited to throw much light on a difficult and disputed subject.

Whether the learned author’s criticism on the original words be exact, or not; the difference between stately and authoritatively, as a herald, and by office and authority, preaching to regularly convened congregations; and simply declaring what a man knows of Christ and salvation, among relations, juniors, ignorant neighbours, or ignorant persons of any sort, without assuming any authority, seems of great importance. No doubt, in this way, a man’s sphere will often gradually enlarge, till he appears something like an authoritative preacher: but would it not then be proper, that pastors and rulers should send some Barnabas, to confirm what has been done, and to confer the due authority? and would it not be right, in this case, for the person himself to seek, from the pastors and teachers of the church, their regular sanction to his labours, now become more publick, than he at first either expected or intended?—To authorize all who choose, without any human appointment, and in ordinary cases, to become authoritative preachers, seems a dangerous extreme: and to suppose that no man, in an ignorant family, or among poor children, or illiterate neglected persons, may expound a chapter of sacred scripture, or talk to them about their souls, except previously ordained to the ministry; appears suited to destroy all zeal in the laity for the success of the gospel, and to prevent all communication of knowledge to a deluded and perishing world; except by those, who are so fully employed in their own several charges, as to have little opportunity of attempting any thing further; and who are often restricted, by peculiar circumstances, from every exertion out of their own line and department. V. 5—8. It is evident, that Philip the apostle was not here meant, for he continued at Jerusalem; and the mission of Peter and John to Samaria evinces the same: (Note, 14—17 :) and as Philip, one of the seven, was the only person of that name, whom the historian had mentioned, he was doubtless here spoken of. (Marg. Ref. 1.—Note, vi. 2—6, v. 5.)—As Jesus had stayed two days among the Samaritans, and had mentioned them among those, to whom the apostles were to preach; (Notes, i. 4—8. John iv. 39—42;) the apostles do not seem to have hesitated about the admission of the Samaritans into the church, notwithstanding the bigoted enmity of the Jews against them. Probably, Philip went to the same city, (Sychar) where Christ had preached: and, though the impressions made by his word might, in many instances, have been effaced: yet when Philip preached Jesus to them, as the promised Messiah, and wrought many signal mira-

9 ¶ But there was a certain man called Simon, which before-time in the same city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one;

10 To whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God.

11 And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them with sorceries.

12 But when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women.

13 Then Simon himself believed also: and when he was baptized, he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done.

14 ¶ Now when the apostles, which were at Jerusalem, heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John:

15 Who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost.

16 For as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.

17 Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost.

cles in proof of his resurrection from the dead; they with one consent attended on his ministry, and expressed great joy throughout the city, that this blessed "gospel of salvation" had been sent to them, and that they were invited and admitted to share the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. (Marg. Ref. m—s.—Notes, John iv. 5—9. 16—18.)

V. 9—13. It is evident that Simon actually used sorcery, and produced many extraordinary effects by satanical influence, and not merely by human imposture: (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, Ex. vii. 11, 12. 22, 23. xxii. 18:) and, while he boasted, "that he was some great one," (Note, 2 Pet. ii. 18, 19,) the Samaritans were so exceedingly astonished at his sorceries, that they were even fascinated into a belief, that he was a man by whom the great power of God was most signally displayed and exerted: as he avowed himself, or was supposed, to be the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. u—a.—Notes, Is. liii. 1. 1 Cor. i. 20—24. Gal. iii. 1—5, v. 1.) Ecclesiastical historians have given us strange accounts of the horrid blasphemies, which this man propagated; but these seem to have been subsequent to the events here recorded.—The evident and beneficent miracles of Philip, however, confirming his doctrine concerning the kingdom of God, and the salvation of Jesus Christ, being attended by a peculiar blessing, effectually rescued many of the people from the infatuation, and prevailed on them to profess faith in Christ, by being baptized: and, as in Christ there is no distinction of male or female, both men and women were thus received into the church. (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Note, Gal. iii. 26—29, v. 28.) Perhaps Philip exposed the nature and tendency of Simon's magical arts. At length, however, that sorcerer professed himself a believer, and probably had a strong conviction in his mind and conscience of the truth of the gospel: accordingly he too was baptized, and continued to attend on Philip with great assiduity; being as much astonished by beholding Philip's miracles, as the Samaritans had been by his sorceries.—Perhaps Simon deemed Philip a magician of superior skill and attainments, and hoped to get acquainted with the secret of his art, by which he produced effects, far exceeding all that he himself had been able to perform. (*Marg. and Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, xix. 13—20. Ex. vii. 22, 23. V. 14—17. The apostles acted in concert, as a collective body; no one arrogating authority over the others, but every one paying a great regard to the determination of the whole company. Peter, therefore, who was in every thing the most forward to speak and to act, and John the beloved disciple, were "sent" by their brethren to confirm the converted Samaritans in the faith. When they came to the city, and saw the effects of Philip's ministry; they, by prayer and imposition of hands, obtained for the converts the Holy Spirit; that is, his miraculous gifts and operations. For though, as believers, they partook of his regenerating, sanctifying, and comforting influences; yet they had not before been favoured with these extraordinary communications. "Without doubt, Peter and John were sent by the other apostles, partly that they might confirm the doctrine of Philip the deacon; and partly that they might establish a church in that city by apostolical authority." Beza. (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—Some expositors maintain, that none received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, except such as were marked out by God himself, to be pastors and teachers: and others seem to think, that the whole company of Christians partook of them. This, however, is unlikely; (1 Cor. xii. 29, 30) yet it is plain, that others, besides the ministers, were thus favoured. It is probable, that many received the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the apostles' hands; and that from among these persons, the ministers were generally selected, by those who were entrusted with that important concern. (Notes, xiii. 1—3. xiv. 21—23. xix. 1—7. 2 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Tit. i. 5—9.)—It may be supposed, that Peter and John ordained ministers in this city of the Samaritans. But it does not appear, that their laying of hands on some, "that they might receive the Holy Spirit," after having prayed for the company in general that they might partake of these benefits, implied previous ordination.—The rite of confirmation, as practised by many Christian churches, has often been, and still is, spoken of, as a continuation of this apostolical imposition of hands, for the confirmation of new converts, by the Holy Spirit thus given to them. But it is far from evident, that this was done universally by the apostles, or by those who immediately succeeded them. As, however, miraculous powers, rather than sanctifying grace, were thus conferred; unless miraculous powers were now connected with that rite, the parallel must wholly fail. How far something of this kind, properly regulated and conducted, may be rendered subservient to the edification of young persons, descended from Christian parents, and baptized when infants, is another question: but to advance this observance into a sacrament, and even above a sacrament, (as it certainly is advanced, when the Holy Spirit is supposed to be conferred by imposition of hands, and by using words in prayer like those of Peter and John,) puts the subject in a very different light. Doubtless it was at first thus magnified, in order to exalt the episcopal order, to whom the administration of it was confined, as if they were entrusted with apostolical authority: but as miracles are out of the question; so to follow the apostles in faith, humility, diligence, in "preaching in season, out of season," in piety, and self-denial, is the only scriptural or adequate method of magnifying either the episcopal or the clerical office. Assuredly, as this matter is very often conducted, it must be allowed to be an evil; and it ought either to be attended to in another manner, or not at all.—It appears indisputable that Philip was, before these transactions, a regularly ordained minister, or evangelist. (Note, vi. 2—6.)

V. 18—24. Many teachers, and probably private Christians, wrought miracles, and spake with tongues, "as the Spirit gave them utterance:" but the honour of communicating those gifts, by imposition of hands and prayer, was, generally at least, restricted to the apostles. When Simon, therefore, saw the effects which followed from the laying on of their hands; he concluded, that they could, if they chose, impart to him a similar power, supposing that the whole power was at their disposal. (Note, 2 Cor. xiii. 7—10.) This he supposed would admirably subserve his purpose, of obtaining honour and wealth: for by enabling men at his own will to speak foreign languages, without the trouble of learning them; and to cure diseases by a word, he should not only carry on a most lucrative trade, but be almost adored as a deity. Judging therefore of the apostles by himself, and seeing that they were very poor men; he supposed that they would willingly confer this power on him for a sum of money, and he ventured to make this infamous proposal to them. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) His ambitious mind could not be satisfied with the power of working miracles himself; (though indeed this seems not to have been conferred on him;) but he aspired to the unrestricted power of communicating the Holy Spirit, for the same purposes, to whom he pleased. Instead of deeming the very lowest place, among the people of God, too great an honour for one, whose sorcery, impiety, and blasphemy had been so atrocious; as he certainly would have done, if he had been truly converted: he aspired, with horrible pride and ambition, at equality with the apostles in power and authority; while he meant to prostitute the sacred operations of the Holy Spirit, to gratify his love of filthy lucre and of human applause, and attempted to seduce the apostles to concur in the detestable sacrilege!—Whatever miraculous power of discerning men's spirits Peter might possess, and on some occasions exercise, he had no need of it in this case: but, perceiving the extreme wickedness and hypocrisy of Simon, he expressed his abhorrence of his money and of his crime, in the most decided manner. Let him take his treasure with him, if he could, into that perdition, to which he was evidently hastening; for Peter would have none of it. This was not a wish that Simon might perish; but an awful warning that he was in most extreme danger of perdition, which he could not escape if he proceeded further in his present course. Peter added, that he made this proposal, because, being utterly ignorant of God and spiritual things, and awfully blinded by Satan, he had blasphemously thought, that the free and most precious gift of God's Spirit might be bought and sold by a mercenary traffick. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) He was, therefore, evidently destitute of true faith, and “had neither part or lot” in the blessings of the gospel; as “his heart was not right in the “sight of God,” nor was his profession of Christianity sincere. If he would then escape perdition, let him deeply repent of this most horrid wickedness, and pray earnestly to God, that this blasphemous thought of his depraved heart might be pardoned. For though “all manner of “sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven” to the true penitent; yet Simon’s crime came at least so near to that against the Holy Spirit, which never can be pardoned, that it was a very doubtful case, whether God would ever give him true repentance. (Marg. Ref. u—b.—Notes, Matt. xii. 31, 32. 2 Tim. ii. 23—26.) Indeed he was, as it were, so plunged and drenched in impiety, as in the bitterest gall; that he must be most loathsome in the sight of God, and exposed to the most dreadful punishment; and he was, evidently, so bound in the chains of sin and Satan, that the almighty power of God alone could deliver him. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)—Nothing can be more evident, than that the apostle here exhorted an unconverted sinner to repentance and prayer; yea, one who he feared had committed the unpardonable sin, though he did not look upon his case as absolutely hopeless.—When Simon heard this awful warning, denunciation, and exhortation, he desired the apostles to “pray for him:” not that he might be delivered from his ambition, avarice, and impiety; but that he might be exempted from the punishments, which they had mentioned. Perhaps he feared a doom similar to that of Ananias and Sapphira: or he hoped, that by inducing the apostles to conceal his crime, he might escape infamy, and have an opportunity of carrying on his delusions. For he does not seem to have professed any repentance, or to have prayed for himself. (Note, 1 Sam. xv. 30, 31.)—Credible historians inform us, that he retained a sort of profession of Christianity, which he distorted by the most horrible and senseless blasphemies; and thus he became the founder of a most multifarious sect of hereticks, who were long the trial and the scandal of the church. (Marg. Ref. e.)—From his infamous attempt, to bargain for the power of conferring the Holy Spirit, all mercenary contracts for church-benefices, and other methods of turning the concerns of religion into a lucrative trade, are called Simony; of which there have been, and are, a great variety of species; and will be, so long as men continue covetous and ambitious, and verily suppose that “gain is godliness.” It is therefore much easier to expose and declaim against such impious practices, than to find an effectual remedy for them.—Alas, Simon Magus has left far more indisputable successors, than Simon Peter has done: especially in that church which grounds its claims on succeeding to St. Peter’s authority; but not in that church alone. (Notes and P. O. Is. lvi. 9—12. P. O. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)—‘It’ (the sin of Simon) ‘struck at the very foundation of the Christian faith; supposing that the apostles, and other Christians, did their miracles, by some higher art of magick, than that which he had learned; and so they by the same art could teach others to do the same works for any other end.’ Whitby. (Notes, Ex. vii. 13. 22, 23.)—‘They who buy and sell sacred things are the successors, not of Simon Peter, but of Simon Magus.’ Beza.

of many miles, into an uninhabited place, without being told what he was to do when he came thither. (Marg. Ref. h—m.—Notes, John ii. 1—11, vv. 5—8. Heb. xi. 8—10.) But just when he arrived at the spot, a chariot, passing on the road, began to shew for what end he had been sent. In this sat an Ethiopian eunuch, or chief officer, who was the high treasurer of Candace, the queen of Ethiopia in Africa, and possessed great authority in the management of all public concerns. That country seems to have been generally governed by queens, and Candace was a name commonly given to them. (Marg. Ref. n—p.)—As Cornelius the Centurion is supposed to have been the first Gentile convert, it must be concluded, that this man was a proselyte to the whole Jewish religion; and not merely a favourer of some of its grand doctrines and precepts. He had, however, taken a very long journey, in order to worship at Jerusalem; where it cannot be supposed, that he had heard any thing favourable concerning Jesus, from the priests, scribes, and rulers. Yet his heart was prepared to receive the truth: and, as he rode in his chariot, he employed his time in reading the scriptures; and that aloud, as it is evident from the narrative, probably that his servants might hear. By an immediate suggestion from the Spirit of God, Philip was ordered to approach the chariot: and, conscious of a divine mission, he without hesitation enquired of the eunuch, whether he understood the things which he read: who, sensible of his disadvantages, and humbly desirous of instruction, was not offended with the question, though proposed by a stranger of inferior rank. On the contrary he allowed, that he could not discover the prophet's meaning, without an interpreter: and, concluding from Philip's address, attire, or appearance, that he could give him information on the subject, he took him up to him into the chariot. (Marg. Ref. q—y.)

V. 32—35. The passage here quoted has been fully considered. (Notes, Is. liii. 7, 8.)—The Greek translation of the Old Testament was first begun at least in Egypt; thence it had found its way into Ethiopia. Greek was understood by superior persons there; and from this translation, it is highly probable, that without any other teacher, this Ethiopian obtained the knowledge of the true God; and thus became first a proselyte to Judaism, and then a convert to Christianity: what an abundant encouragement to translating, and dispersing translations of the sacred oracles!—The chief difficulty, which the eunuch found in the prophecy, related to the person of whom the sacred writer spoke. 'Was Isaiah thus inhumanly put to death by the Jews? Or did he foretel the sufferings of some future and greater person?' Doddridge.—This is a question which, it might be thought, would force itself on every attentive reader of this extraordinary prophecy. And it gave Philip an opportunity of instructing the Ethiopian in the grand truths of the gospel, to the greatest advantage. We may suppose, that he shewed him the circumstantial and exact accomplishment of the prediction, in the Person, doctrine, conduct, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus; concerning whom it is most likely, that he had heard many disadvantageous reports, whilst at Jerusalem: and also the necessity and nature, the benefit and efficacy of faith in him, as the Saviour of the lost. 'It is probable, that it was in the familiar way of dialogue, ... that Philip continued to instruct this stranger in the doctrine of Christ.' Campbell. (Note, 4.) 'Who can be named either of kings or prophets, to whom these things agree? No one truly.' Grotius de veritate. Yet in his notes on the chapter, this learned writer endeavours to interpret the words concerning the prophet Jeremiah!—He was led, &c. (32, 33.) V. 36—40. The discourse of Philip, no doubt comprising abundant instruction, with animated exhortations and persuasions; and the prophecy as shewn to coincide with its accomplishment in so wonderful a manner; fully convinced the eunuch, through the concurrent teaching and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that Jesus was the promised Messiah: and he was enabled to understand the nature of his kingdom and salvation. Accordingly, he desired to be numbered among his disciples. Doubtless Philip had shewn him the nature of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity: when therefore they came to water, he desired to be baptized; of which he was not likely, for a long time, to have any other opportunity; and, stedfastly professing faith in Jesus as “the Messiah, the “Son of God,” he was baptized by Philip.—Men will form their conjectures, concerning the mode in which Philip baptized him, according to their different sentiments on that subject. (Marg. Ref. m—r.—Notes, ii. 41. Matt. iii. 5, 6. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 19. Mark i. 4—11, v. 5. 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22, v. 21.) As soon as the eunuch was baptized, the Spirit of God miraculously conveyed Philip away, so that he saw him no more: (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, 1 Kings xviii. 12—16. 2 Kings ii. 16—18. Ez. iii. 12—15:) but this rather served to confirm the faith of the Ethiopian: and he went on his way home, “rejoicing,” not in his baptism, (for in that Simon Magus might have rejoiced also,) but in Christ and in his glorious salvation. (Marg. Ref. t.)—History informs us, that this eunuch became a preacher of the gospel, in Ethiopia and the adjacent regions; and there founded a flourishing church, which continued for several ages afterwards; and it is supposed, on very probable grounds, that he was endued with the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit, to qualify him for that service.—Philip being conveyed to Azotus, or Ashdod, proceeded to preach in the several cities on the sea-coast, as Joppa, Lydda, and Saron, till he came to Cæsarea, where he afterwards generally resided. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The death of eminent ministers and Christians ought to be lamented as a publick loss to survivors, though it is their own greatest gain; and we should honour their memory, however men may disgrace them, or hate us for our regard to them. But the Lord does not want the services of the most eminent men: (Note, Matt. xiv. 8—11:) if he permit them to be cut off, when they seem scarcely to have begun their work, or if persecution “make havoc “in the church;” he can over-rule these events to the glory of his name, and the more extensive promulgation of his gospel. At the same time the most furious enemies cannot touch, or even terrify, those who are most obnoxious to them, unless he permit them.—The glory of his grace often shines forth with peculiar lustre in our view, when we are informed of the manner, in which his most honoured servants spent the years preceding their conversion. Who, that witnessed Saul, ready to embroil his hands in the blood of Stephen, and wasting the church like a beast of prey, could have expected, that he would at length prove the most eminent of all, who ever laboured to promote the Redeemer’s cause?—Wherever the true believer is driven, he carries with him his knowledge of the gospel, as an inestimable treasure, not only for his own benefit, but to make others also truly rich; (Note, 2 Cor. iv. 7:) and in one way or other he will make known the preciousness of Christ in every place: for when a simple desire of doing good influences the heart, it will be found impossible to exclude a man from all opportunity of usefulness.—Facts authenticate the truth of the gospel, when it is faithfully preached: and though miracles are no longer wrought, yet sinners are converted; and unclean spirits reluctantly quit possession of those, over whom they have long reigned with uncontrouled sway: and the gospel brings with it substantial and permanent joy to every heart, house, village, city, or country, in which it is cordially received.

V. 9—13.

When the ministers of Christ labour with success, the servants of Satan will endeavour to counteract them. The magicians of Egypt appeared to do the same things with their enchantments, which Moses did with his rod; yet the men of God shall in due time obtain a decided victory. (Notes, Ex. vii. 11, 12. 22, 23. viii. 7, 8. 18, 19. ix. 11. 2 Tim. iii. 6—9.) Human artifice and satanical influence may effect strange things, to astonish and fascinate the deluded multitude. Thus wicked men may give out that they are “some great ones;” and many, “from the least “to the greatest,” may give heed to them, as if they “were “the great power of God:” but when “the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of our Lord

CHAP. IX.

Saul, having sought and obtained letters from the high priest, sets out for Damascus, to persecute the disciples, 1, 2. Drawing near the city, he is surrounded by a light from heaven, and, falling to the earth, hears Jesus expostulating with him, 3—5. He submits, and is led blind to Damascus, where he continues three days, without sight or food, 6—9. Ananias is directed in a vision to go to him; by whom he is restored to sight, and baptized, 10—18. Immediately he preaches in the synagogue, with great boldness, 19—22. The Jews seek to kill him, but he escapes from them, 23—25. He goes to Jerusalem, and is by Barnabas introduced to the apostles, 26—28. Preaching boldly in the name of Jesus, his life is in danger, and he is sent to Tarsus, 29, 30. The church has rest, and is edified and multiplied, 31. Peter heals Eneas at Lydda, 32—35; and at Joppa raises Tabitha from the dead, 36—43.

“Jesus Christ,” are powerfully brought home to men’s hearts, the charm is dissolved, and the truth rendered triumphant. Indeed, whoever compares the juggles and ambiguous pretences to miracle, or extraordinary operation, that shrink from investigation, which every age produces and fosters, and then detects and despises; with the open, beneficent, incontestable, and disinterested miracles of Christ and his apostles, will easily discern the most manifest difference, or rather the most entire contrariety. The one can only subserve the credit or interest of designing men, and abet delusion, hypocrisy, or immorality; the other evidently tended to promote the best of all causes, even that of truth and holiness: the former have ever sunk into neglect, in proportion as they have been dispassionately examined; the other have been despised by superficial and self-conceited enquirers alone: while men of superior wisdom, piety, and diligence, searching deeply into these matters, have always decidedly borne testimony to their reality and importance. But when impostors have exhausted their ingenuity, in devising schemes for deceiving mankind, they sometimes assume a profession of true religion, as their last resource. They avowedly embrace the gospel; they attend on the ordinances of God; they attach themselves to his ministers, as greatly impressed and affected by their words and works: and thus they aspire to a character for sanctity, in subserviency to their selfish designs. Nor should we hastily censure those servants of God, who are thus imposed upon: the Lord alone “searches the heart;” we know that his grace is sufficient for the chief of sinners; we ought to hope the best of professed believers, till any of them discover their hypocrisy; and men of this description often carry matters very plausibly, till some suitable temptation puts them off their guard, and then they are made manifest in their true character.

V. 14—25.

The abundant unction of the Holy Spirit divests men of their narrow and selfish prejudices, and teaches them to own all as brethren, who receive the word of God, and to impart to them some spiritual good as they have opportunity and ability: for in these things, there is no room for competition, as no man is impoverished by others being enriched. Yet the carnal mind converts even spiritual gifts into nutriment for ostentation, envy, and ambition: (P. O. 1 Cor. xiv. 26—40;) selfish hypocrites judge of others by themselves; and covetous men deem a large sum of money an irresistible allurements, and a valuable consideration for the most sacred offices and endowments. Plausible hypocrites are often detected by their desire of pre-eminence, and by devising to render religion subservient to worldly interest. (Notes, 2 Pet. ii. 12—19. 3 John,

9—12.) But if men attempt to put “filthy lucre” in competition with the truths, ordinances, precepts, gifts, and glory of God; we must abhor their favours and bribes, and warn them that they are in the way of perdition. Indeed, many high and plausible pretensions are sufficiently detected to be base impostures, by the mercenary spirit of those who boast of them; and then set the pretended gift of God to sale, and dispose of it for ready money. (P. O. Ez. xiii. 17—23.) But, though simoniacal practices are every where exclaimed against, they almost universally insinuate themselves into all things relative to religion!—Commonly those who aspire to be the chief, have “neither part nor lot in the matter;” for a proud and covetous heart cannot be “right in the sight of God.” But when we most plainly perceive, that men are “in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity;” and when we most solemnly warn them of their guilt and danger; we should still exhort them to repent of their wickedness, and to pray to God, if peradventure it may be forgiven.—Men often imagine that their thoughts are free, and have no sin in them; yet “the thought of the heart” may possibly be so atrocious, as to exclude a man from repentance and forgiveness. Many desire others to pray for them, who do not humbly pray for themselves; and many at some times dread punishment, who yet resolutely proceed to commit the most horrible impieties. The ministers of Christ, however, must testify against such persons; and preach the gospel of Christ, in cities or villages, and in every place as they have opportunity, and then leave the event with the Lord.

V. 26—40.

We ought not to be discouraged, when called to minister in obscure places, or to few hearers: seldom was more effectual and extensive good done in the most numerous assembly, than followed Philip’s preaching to one stranger in a desert: and implicit obedience and submission become the servants of God. He “knows whom he has chosen;” and a thousand incidents, apparently casual, form a part of his great plan, for bringing them to the knowledge of his salvation. In this view nothing can be decidedly deemed little, or unimportant; as we know not what vast effects may be connected with it.—The Lord will have some of all ranks, nations, and complexions among his redeemed people, to shew the power and largeness of his grace. Where he has implanted a desire after himself, he will in due time satisfy it: though such enquirers may go to places, and among persons, where the most religion might be expected, and yet learn nothing of Jesus; and even come away more prejudiced or bewildered than before. (P. O. Matt. ii. 1—8.) Those who seek the truth will improve their leisure time in searching the scriptures;

even when they have but small advantages for understanding it. But alas! how few of our nobles, and ministers of state, study that sacred volume, as they ride in their chariots! or willingly take long journeys to enquire after God, or worship him! Surely this Ethiopian will rise up in judgment against them, and condemn them!—Should any one, on some special occasion, be found reading the scriptures; and should a minister of Christ, in the most grave, courteous, and modest manner, enquire of him, whether he understood what he read; it is to be feared, he would resent the question as impertinence. But humility is teachable, and leads to wisdom: and when we are conscious of our ignorance, and willing to gain information even from an inferior or a stranger; we shall not be left without instruction. When God, by means of the Bible alone, excites serious enquiries after the truth; he will send an expositor to obviate difficulties and perplexities: for while many things, and those the most essential, are so plain, that any honest reader may understand them; others require the aid of teachers and interpreters. Thus, while one society disperses the sacred scriptures, another sends missionaries: both are needful, and there should be no competition between them, but most cordial concurrence in their most excellent designs.—In reading the word of God, we should pause to enquire, of whom, and of what, the sacred writers spoke. But we should especially employ our thoughts about that meek and holy, that patient and suffering Redeemer, who was “led as a sheep to the slaughter, and was dumb as a lamb before the shearer.” In his humiliation his “judgment” and his life “were taken away:” but he is now exalted at the right hand of the Father; his generation as the Son of God is abundantly declared, the generation of the righteous own him as their spiritual Progenitor, and all judgment is vested in him.—Such prophecies are excellent texts, from whence to preach Jesus to sinners; for they at the same time explain and demonstrate his doctrine: and as this is the substance of all our preaching, so we may expect that it will be crowned with peculiar success. If we “believe with all our heart, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God,” and profess that faith by such methods as we can, we shall surely be accepted in attending divine ordinances. And when the enquirer after salvation becomes acquainted with Jesus and his precious gospel, he will “go on his way rejoicing,” to fill up his station in society, from other motives, and in another manner, than before: and thus the conversion of one man may prove a blessing to vast multitudes.—The communion of saints’ on earth, though pleasant, is commonly transient: their different employments and services call them into different places; but under the influence of the same Spirit, they all “serve their generation,” and then they will meet before the throne, to part no more, but to join in unceasing and joyful praises to their common Lord and Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. It is not certainly known, in what year Saul was converted: perhaps it might be two or three years after our Lord’s ascension. (vii. 58. Philem. 9.) He, however, persisted in persecuting the disciples for a considerable time, with increasing violence: and he menaced the whole multitude with slaughter and extirpation; as if he could not breathe without uttering threatenings against them, or would, if able, have “slain them with the breath of his lips.” (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, viii. 1—4. Is. xi. 2—5, v. 4. xxx. 27, 28.) Probably, the diligence and success of those, whom he had driven from Jerusalem, in propagating the gospel, increased his rage and animosity. Being a zealous volunteer in the service, he devised plans for fully exterminating the religion of Jesus, and was ready to carry them into execution, to the utmost of his ability: and with this view he proposed to the high priest, (probably Caiaphas,) that he should give him letters from the council and chief priests, to the rulers of the synagogues in Damascus; authorizing them to apprehend those who believed in Jesus, and to send them bound to Jerusalem to be punished. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, xxii. 1—5. xxvi. 9—11.)—The sanhedrim had no doubt an ecclesiastical authority over the Jewish synagogues in other countries: yet they could not exercise it in many respects without the concurrence of the synagogues themselves, and the connivance of the civil rulers. Damascus had long been the capital city of Syria: it was still very large and populous, and numbers of Jews resided there. It does not clearly appear under whose authority it was at this time; but probably the ruling powers were disposed to concur in the execution of the commission, granted by the high priest and council of the Jews.—Perhaps some of the persons, who had been converted on the day of Pentecost, or soon after, had first carried the gospel thither; and those who had been scattered by the preceding persecution, seem to have laboured successfully among the Jews of that city.

questioned, whether one of them thought of that method of deliverance, by which the Lord intended to rescue them. (Notes, 10—14. xii. 12—17.) For when Saul drew near to the city, and doubtless pleased himself with thinking of the consternation which he was about to excite; he was at once surrounded with a dazzling splendour, like lightning, brighter than that of the meridian sun: and, falling to the ground with terror and amazement, he heard the voice of one calling to him by name repeatedly, and saying, “Why persecutest thou me?” (Marg. Ref. e—i.—10. Gen. xxii. 1. 11. xlvi. 2. Ex. iii. 4. 1 Sam. iii. 10.) Saul had imagined, that he was attempting to extirpate a company of deluded and obstinate hereticks, or sectarians; and that he was doing service to God, by his zeal for the law of Moses and the traditions of the elders, against a worthless company of dangerous innovators: but it now appeared that he was persecuting “the Lord of glory,” who considered the cause of the disciples as his own. (Notes, xxvi. 9—11. Gen. xii. 1—3. Zech. ii. 6—9. John xv. 17—25. xvi. 1—3.) And why did he this? Had they done him any harm? or was there no evidence that Jesus was the Messiah, after all the miracles wrought by him and his apostles? Saul, astonished by this most alarming expostulation, enquired who that glorious Lord was, who thus appeared and spake to him: to which it was answered, that he was Jesus, the Nazarene, whom he had no doubt often derided and blasphemed under that title, and compelled others to blaspheme, and whom he now persecuted in his disciples. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, xxvi. 12—18.) But, as it would be hard, or painful, for a man “to kick against the spikes,” by which he could only wound himself; thus Saul could only injure and ruin himself, by contending with One, who possessed “all power in heaven and earth.” On hearing this, Saul was exceedingly terrified and astonished; probably he dreaded the immediate vengeance of that glorious Lord, whom he had so deeply offended: his guilt was undeniable, his pleas were all silenced; and the concurring influence of the Holy Spirit enlightening, convincing, and humbling his heart, he submitted without reserve, and only asked “Lord, what wilt thou have me to do.” If mercy could be extended to him, he was prepared for any submission, or self-denial, which might be required of him. Accordingly, he was directed to go into the city, and there to wait for further orders. (*Marg. V. 8, 9. Saul now arose from the earth: but, when his eyes were opened, he found that the splendour, with which he had been surrounded, had blinded him. This effect proved the whole transaction to have been a reality, and not merely an illusion of the imagination. (Marg. Ref. s.)—He was therefore led to Damascus; and he entered that city a harmless lamb, though he set out to journey thither with the fierceness of a tiger! We are not informed, whether his attendants were, or were not, converted; but this silence seems to indicate that they were not. After his arrival in the city, terror, remorse, anxiety, self-examination, and prayer, with earnest desires of mercy, so occupied his mind, and his body also was so disordered, that he took no sustenance of any kind for three days; for it pleased the Lord to leave him so long to his reflections, before he sent him any relief, or further instruction. (Marg. Ref. t.)—It is impossible to describe what Saul thought, felt, and experienced, during this awful and important interval. There is, however, abundant reason to conclude, that the Holy Spirit enlightened his mind at this time, with a just view of the divine law, in its spirituality and excellency; and thus shewed him the worthlessness of his pharisaical righteousness; and his exceedingly heinous guilt, not only in persecuting the Messiah in his followers, but also in his whole conduct, and the state of his heart. This seems to be intimated in some parts of his epistles; and indeed was essentially necessary to a right understanding of that gospel, which he was to spend the rest of his life in preaching. Gal. i. 11—24. ii. 17—21.)—With this narrative in view, can we wonder, that one, thus “saved by grace,” and made an apostle at the very moment when he might most justly have been sent down “quick into hell,” should especially delight in expatiating on the divine sovereignty, and on the riches and freeness of “the grace of our God “and Saviour,” in saving his chosen people? The same doctrines may be distinctly traced in the other parts of scripture, and abundantly proved from them: but this apostle, snatched as a brand from the burning, and rejoicing with most grateful exultation in his stupendous deliverance and astonishing felicity, with a noble, but highly rational enthusiasm, delights in recurring to the source of all his hopes and joys, and in calling on his brethren, to ascribe unreservedly all the glory of their salvation to God alone. Were our humiliation equally deep, and our views of the way in which we have been “called “out of darkness into marvellous light,” as distinct as his were; few objections to these doctrines, or difficulties concerning them, would trouble our minds: and we should soon perceive the holy tendency and efficacy of them.

V. 10—14. Ananias had previously been a “devout” person, according to the law of Moses; and was now become a disciple of Christ, and probably a preacher of the gospel: though it is not likely that he was one of the seventy disciples. (Notes, xxii. 6—16, vv. 12—16.) To him the Lord Jesus appeared “in a vision,” and addressing him also by name (4), he directed him to go to Saul of Tarsus; who was employed in prayer, and was prepared, by a coincident vision, for his coming to restore his sight, of which he had lately been bereaved.—Saul had been a strict Pharisee, and doubtless had made long, formal, and constant prayers before this. (Notes, Matt. vi. 5—8. xxiii. 14:) but he now prayed as a sinner for salvation, and doubtless to that Saviour whom he had before persecuted. (Marg. Ref. x. z. c.) It was indeed most wonderful, that he, who before “breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Jesus,” should now pour out humble prayers to him; and it was a sufficient proof, that he had submitted, and was changed, and therefore ought to be encouraged.—Ananias, however, was astonished at hearing the name of Saul, in this connexion:

he considered the message on which he was sent, as replete with peril; and he spake, as if forgetful that Jesus had fully known of Saul’s previous conduct, or the intent of his journey to Damascus. (Marg. Ref. e, f, h.)—“To “call on the name of Jesus,” is here used as the distinguished characteristic of a believer.—“The unbelieving “Jews say of him, preaching Christ in their synagogues, “Is not this he who wasted those, who called on that “name in Jerusalem?” (21.) Thus St. Paul writes to “saints, ... under the title of “all that call upon the name “of the Lord Jesus Christ in every place;” (1 Cor. i. 2;) “and then in the very next verse, he himself prays, that “grace and peace may be derived on them from God the “Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.” ... And he bids “Christians “follow after peace with all those that call “upon the Lord with a pure heart;” that is, with all “believers; it being the same thing to believe in, and to “call upon, the name of the Lord Jesus. Hence St. “Paul saith, “He that believeth in him shall not be “ashamed, because it is written, Whosoever shall call “on the name of the Lord shall be saved.” (Joel ii. “32.) And hence we learn, who that Lord is, whom “Ananias bids St. Paul invoke, when he saith, “Arise “and be baptized, calling upon the name of the Lord,” “even the Lord Jesus who appeared to him; (xxii. 16;) “... and what is meant by that phrase, namely, ‘Profess “thy faith, by being baptized in, and by calling on, his “name.’ This was a thing so continually practised by the “first Christians, that Pliny mentions it in his epistle to “Trajan, telling him, that it was the custom of the “Christians to sing a hymn to Christ, as God. For, St. “Paul, in his thirteen first epistles, prays for “grace and “peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus;” “and St. John in his second epistle, ver. 3, doth the same.’ Whitby. Some indeed would render the clause, “are “called by thy name:” but the direct meaning of the original, the repetition of the same language in different connexions, and the remarks contained in the quotation just made, are sufficient to shew, that this translation is absolutely inadmissible. (Notes, ii. 14—21, v. 21. Rom. x. 12—17, v. 12. 14.)

tion, and commanded him to go without delay: as this violent persecutor was "a vessel of election," whom the Lord had fore-known, and meant to employ; that, being filled with the treasure of the gospel, he might convey his name and doctrine among the nations of the earth, and even to their kings, as well as to his people the "children of Israel."—It should be noted, that this precedes in the history the admission of any uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, Rom. ix. 22, 23. 2 Cor. iv. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 20—22.) At the same time, he would "shew him, how great things he should suffer "for his name's sake," according to the sufferings which he had inflicted on others. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—Some think, that a distinct representation was made in a vision to Saul's mind of all the various persecutions, which he afterwards underwent: at least he had such a discovery made of them, as rendered his subsequent ministry a lively copy of Christ's own example, who foresaw every thing that he was to endure from the very first. He did not, however, fully know the particulars, as many subsequent passages prove. (xx. 22. xxvii. 24. Rom. xv. 23—28.)

V. 17—22. Ananias, thus admonished, obeyed Jesus without further hesitation. He no longer considered Saul as a persecutor, but as a disciple; and, laying his hands upon him, he called him "Brother Saul;" while he informed him that he was sent to him by the Lord, (even that Jesus, whom he had seen by the way, surrounded with awful glory,) in order that he might miraculously be restored to sight, and then made partaker of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. p—r. t.)—Ananias, who at most is only supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples, only "laid his hands on him, "that he might receive his sight;" and ... he was replenished with the Holy Ghost by the "immediate gift of Christ; he being an "apostle not of "man, nor by man, but by Christ alone." Gal. i. 1. Whitby. This appears to have been the case; especially as the conferring of the Holy Spirit, in his miraculous gifts, seems in all cases, previous to that of Cornelius and his friends, to have taken place after baptism. (Note, x. 44—48.)—It is more probable, that Ananias did not "lay hands on him a second time; as we do not elsewhere "find, that any but the apostles had the power of conferring the Holy Spirit." Doddridge.—At the words of Ananias, however, "there fell from the eyes" of Saul, "as it were scales," which had occasioned his blindness. These had been an emblem of the benighted state of his soul, amidst the full light of the gospel; as the recovery of his sight, by the power and mercy of Christ, was of his spiritual illumination. (Note, 2 Cor. iv. 5, 6.) When this token of reconciliation had been granted him, he arose, and, by being baptized, professed himself a disciple of the Lord Jesus; and having thus obtained hope and peace, he took proper refreshment, and found his vigour and strength of body restored to him. These extraordinary events being then made known by Ananias to his brethren, Saul was received among them, and continued some time with them at Damascus: but, instead of delivering his letters to the persons to whom they were addressed, he boldly went to the synagogues, and preached Christ to the Jews there assembled; shewing that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah, and "the Son of God." As his character was well known, and the intent of his journey to Damascus: this change excited the amazement of all men, and probably, in many instances, gave energy to his testimony; though others were offended by it. (Marg. Ref. b—g.—Note, 10—13.) But he grew more strong in faith, and more powerful in argument: so that the Jews could by no means answer his reasonings from "the scripture," proving that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that all the ancient prophecies had been fulfilled in him.—From his own account, it appears that he received his complete knowledge of the gospel, immediately by revelation from Jesus Christ. V. 23—30. When Saul had preached a while at Damascus, he went into Arabia, and laboured there for a considerable time : and after his return to Damascus, the Jews enraged at his supposed apostasy, and his pertinacity in preaching that Jesus was the Messiah, took counsel to slay him. (Gal. i. 17, 18.) It seems that Aretas, an Arabian king, had got possession of Damascus at this time ; and that the governor appointed by him favoured and abetted the designs against Saul. (2 Cor. xi. 32, 33.) The Jews either preferred this method of proceeding against him, to sending him bound to Jerusalem ; or they had been deprived of that power by a change of the government. Saul, however, providentially discovered and eluded their malice, which was very active, vigilant, and sanguinary, as they had assassins stationed at every gate of that large city, ready to murder him, as soon as ever he approached. (Marg. Ref. i.—1.—Notes, xxiii. 12—22. xxv. 1—5.) Having escaped that danger he went from thence to Jerusalem. This was three years after his conversion : yet when he would have joined the Christians there, they questioned his sincerity, and suspected that his enmity to them had only assumed another form ; aiming to do them that mischief by subtlety, which before he had effected by violence. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) Damascus was not much above a hundred and fifty miles from Jerusalem ; but modern conveniences for a regular correspondence between distant places were then unknown ; and some wars in the neighbourhood are supposed to have greatly obstructed the communication. Saul had spent a considerable part of his time in Arabia, in an obscure situation ; and the former perils, alarms, and sufferings, which the disciples had experienced from him, had rendered them unreasonably suspicious. But Barnabas, who by some means had obtained fuller information, and had contracted an acquaintance with Saul, introduced him to the apostles Peter and James ; the other apostles being absent at that time, no doubt preaching the gospel in different places ; and, having given them a satisfactory account of the manner and effects of his conversion, he was admitted to communion with the disciples, both publick and private, and soon began to preach among them. (Marg. Ref. p—t.—Note, Gal. i. 15—24.) He especially disputed with the Grecians or Hellenists, whom he had before joined against Stephen ; (Note, vi. 9—14 ;) and his unanswerable arguments so exasperated them, that they purposed to kill him likewise. He therefore retired to Tarsus, his native city, and preached there and in the adjacent places for some time, till at length Barnabas went, and brought him to Antioch. (Note, xi. 25, 26.)—It is supposed that the apostle went by land to Tarsus, and that Cæsarea Philippi is meant in the thirtieth verse. (Gal. i. 21.—Note, Matt. xvi. 13—16.)

28 And he was with them, ^t coming in and going out at Jerusalem.

29 And ^u he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, ^x and disputed against the ^y Grecians : but they went about to slay him.

31 Then had ^c the churches rest throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and ^d were edified ; ^e and walking in the fear of the Lord, ^f and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, ^g were multiplied.

V. 31. When Saul, the grand instrument of persecution, was become a zealous preacher, and was removed out of the reach of his enemies, the persons concerned seem to have been disheartened. Other causes likewise concurring, the persecution was suspended, and the churches were left in peace. This opportunity they diligently improved, to edify one another in knowledge, faith, and every good thing; and to settle all the concerns of the several churches, in order to the regular administration of divine ordinances. The disciples likewise “walked in the “fear of the Lord,” or habitually conducted themselves, with reverential regard to the authority of God, as his upright worshippers; and enjoyed much comfort, and were animated in obedience, by the power of the Holy Spirit, in the hope and peace of the gospel: and thus many others were won over to them, and their numbers were continually increased in each church, and churches were formed in other places.—‘Their shining piety above others, and their great joy in the Holy Ghost attracting others to the faith.’ Whitby. (Note, Zech. viii. 20—23.)—‘The edification of the church is the event of persecution, provided the Lord be patiently waited for.’ Beza. (Marg. Ref.)—The conversion of Saul, from a furious and most active persecutor, to a zealous, unwearied, and self-denying preacher of the gospel, and his subsequent labours and sufferings in the cause, for a long course of years, is an undoubted fact, which ought to be accounted for by all, who have the least doubt of the divine original of Christianity. If his own narrative be admitted, Christianity is without doubt divine, and the only true religion; and those who hesitate to admit his testimony in its full latitude, are required, in support of their cause, to give some other rational and probable account of so unparalleled an event.

V. 32—35. Little has been thus far recorded concerning the labours of the apostles, except at Jerusalem; though doubtless they incessantly endeavoured to propagate the gospel in every way which they could. Here, however, we find that Peter made a circuit through various parts of the land of Judea, and the adjacent parts, probably to visit the places where the gospel had been planted, by those whom the persecution had scattered: and coming to “the saints,” or believers, at Lydda, a town near the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, he wrought a miracle, “in the name of Jesus,” and by his power, which was the means of convincing and converting to the faith of Christ many of the inhabitants of that and the adjacent country: so that they believed him to be “the Lord,” the Messiah; and became his disciples. (Marg. Ref.) “Eneas, Jesus, the Christ, healeth thee” (34). ‘It is worth our while to observe the great difference that there is, between the manner in which this miracle was wrought by Peter, and that in which Christ performed his works of divine power and goodness.’ Doddridge. (viii. 40.) It is highly probable, that the gospel was introduced at Lydda by his ministry: and that Eneas was made known to Peter, as an afflicted person favourable to the gospel.

43 And it came to pass, that he tarried many days in Joppa, with ^l one Simon ^m a tanner

(Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, John xv. 6—8, v. S. Phil. i. 9—11, v. 11.) She not only gave away her substance; but she employed her time and skill in labouring diligently and constantly, for the poor widows and other believers; so that her death was considered as a publick loss. The principal persons therefore among the disciples, having heard of Peter's miracle at Lydda, which was but about six miles from Joppa, (Marg. Ref. q, x,) sent for him, in hopes that he would be enabled to restore her to life again; which evinced very strong faith, as it does not appear, that any apostle had hitherto wrought a miracle of this kind. When he came, and had witnessed the deep mourning of those, who expressed at once their gratitude and their loss, by shewing the garments which Dorcas had made for them, "while she was with them;" he went alone into the room where she lay, and there prevailed by prayer for her restoration to life. (Marg. Ref. y—b.) In performing this miracle Peter used words, in some respects like what Jesus had employed on similar occasions; but he had prefaced it with humble prayer upon his knees. (Notes, 1 Kings xvii. 20—24. 2 Kings iv. 33—35. John xi. 41—46.) He was doubtless assured, that this request was granted, before he addressed Dorcas. His words were not, "I say unto thee, Arise," in the language of authority, but simply, "Tabitha, arise," as an intimation that Jesus had restored her life: and it should also be remembered that there was no witness to the transaction.—This miracle was not only a high gratification and valuable benefit to the admiring thankful company of believers; but it was the means also of converting very many to the faith. Peter therefore, finding an opening for usefulness at Joppa, continued there for some time, lodging at the house of one Simon a tanner, and not with Tabitha; perhaps, lest he should seem to receive a recompence for the exercise of his miraculous powers. (Notes, viii. 18—24. Matt. x. 7, 8.)—It is remarkable, that there is no instance in scripture of a prophet, or eminent minister of religion, being raised from the dead; (for it does not appear, that St. Paul was entirely dead, when he had been stoned at Lystra; Note, xiv. 19, 20;) and but few of their miraculous recoveries from sickness: though we should perhaps have thought, that these were the most proper cases for a divine interposition.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The power of doing evil has seldom been adequate to the inclination, even in those who have been most successful persecutors and destroyers in the church, or in the world: for could scourges of God execute their threatenings, as readily as they utter them, their very breath would be fatal to mankind, and especially to the disciples of the Lord.—The restraints providentially imposed upon us, previous to our conversion, prevent much mischief; or the deplorable history of our past lives would have been still worse.—Even when sinners are most eager to execute their rebellious purposes, the Lord sometimes discovers his designs of mercy towards them: and thus the extremity of their wickedness illustrates the infinite riches and power of his grace.—While we are praying, in imminent dangers or overwhelming troubles, we are apt to be discouraged, if we can see no way by which we may be delivered: but he, who in a moment is able to change furious persecutors into zealous preachers, can perform his promises by various methods, of which we have not the least conception.—The manifested light and glory of the divine justice, holiness, and power, would sink the stoutest rebel on earth to despair at once, if it were not accompanied with some indications of mercy and grace: but the Lord sends convictions and terrors to abase men in the dust, that their hearts may be prepared for "peace and joy in believing."—No man can have a good or even a plausible reason for rebellion against the authority of God: he has given no cause for it, nor can any good come of it, but directly the contrary: for "it is hard to kick against the pricks."—Little do proud Pharisees and despisers of the gospel imagine, while indulging their contempt and hatred of those whom they deem wild enthusiasts or obstinate sectaries, that they are persecuting the Lord himself, and that he will resent it accordingly. He is One with his disciples, and they with him: he will requite every favour done to them, as if done to himself; and whoever injures them touches "the apple of his eye." But opposers of the gospel do not generally believe, that Jesus is "the Lord of glory;" and that all their hard speeches and strenuous endeavours against him, are a direct attack upon the Lord of Hosts himself. (Note, Jude 14—16.) When he shall therefore appear, in far more terrible majesty, than he did to Saul of Tarsus; they will tremble with astonishment at the awful consequences of that conduct, in which they now perhaps imagine there is much merit, or by which they seek renown.—When a sinner is brought to a proper sense of his own state, character, and

Cornelius, a devout centurion in Cæsarea but a gentile, being directed by an angel, sends for Peter to instruct him, 1—8; who in the mean time is prepared by a vision, 9—16; and, being commanded by the Spirit, he, attended by certain disciples, accompanies the messengers, 17—23. Cornelius renders undue honour to Peter, who declines it, 24—26; and shews the occasion of his sending for him, avowing the readiness of himself and his friends to receive the word of God from him, 27—33. conduct, he will submit without reserve; allowing that he might justly be left to perish; casting himself wholly on the mercy of the divine Saviour, and enquiring what he would have him to do. This will thenceforth be the language of his heart and prayers continually: 'What must I do to be saved? In what way must I come? What means shall I use? What method shall I take to obtain assurance of my reconciliation? What return can I make for thy mercy? How shall I recommend thy salvation to others? Shall I enter upon this or the other business, or not? How shall I behave in these circumstances, or manage this matter?' These, and such like questions, the believer will have daily to propose to the Lord, in faith and prayer; desiring to be taught, inclined, and enabled to know and do his will. (Note, Col. iii. 16, 17, v. 16.) When this submission has been made, the Lord takes the humbled penitent under his direction, and teaches him what he would have him to do: yet he does not shew him the whole at once, but gradually, as it becomes necessary: and he uses his servants as instruments in this work; that his appointments may be honoured, and 'the communion of the saints' may be promoted. Nor does he generally bring transgressors to "peace and joy in believing," without such previous rebukes, sorrows, and distresses of conscience, as may evince the atrociousness of their crimes, and lay a foundation for their future humility, gratitude, patience, and meekness.—Under great remorse of conscience, and when the soul is deeply engaged about eternal things, a man loses his desire after animal recreation: so that fasting in such circumstances is often a matter of course, rather than an imposed duty. But happy are they, who thus sow in tears, that they may reap in joy! (Note, Ps. cxvi. 5, 6. P. O.—Notes, Matt. v. 4. 2 Cor. vii. 9—11.)

V. 10—22.

"Behold he," the proud Pharisee, or the prouder infidel, "prayeth;" in that manner which the Saviour notices with cordial approbation! Behold the licentious profligate, the iniquitous publican, the unmerciful oppressor, or the daring blasphemer, "prayeth!" What happy tidings are these, when well authenticated, to such as understand the nature and efficacy of prayer; of such prayer, as the humbled sinner presents before a merciful God, for the blessings of eternal salvation!—Yet, even eminent disciples are sometimes staggered at the commands of their gracious Lord, though they express their readiness to obey: and while they allow, in general, the infinite sufficiency of his mercy, they are apt to assign limits to it in particular instances, according to their several prejudices and passions! But the Lord is peculiarly glorified in far exceeding all our limitations, and scanty expectations; and in shewing that they are "the chosen vessels of his mercy," whom we are ready to consider as the objects of his most righteous vengeance: nay, that perhaps, he intends them to do and to suffer more in his cause, and for his sake, than those who stand highest in our estimation. This was the case with him, who had done so "much evil to the "saints" of the Lord Jesus at Jerusalem, and was preparing to do all he could against those, who called on his name at Damascus; and in more obscure instances, the same is taking place continually.—He expects implicit obedience from his servants: all their objections arise from unbelief; and when they are in a right frame of mind, they would go even into the lion's den, should their obedience require it, assured that he will be with them, to support or deliver them.—Converting grace renders believers the children of the same Father, abolishes their former distinctions, and terminates their enmities: and, when the bitterest foe, or the vilest malefactor, becomes a real disciple, we are required to own and to love him as a "brother," without any upbraidings, prejudice, or resentment; and we should rejoice to be useful to him, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns.—The efficacious teaching of the Holy Spirit causes "the scales" of ignorance, prejudice, and pride to fall from the eyes of the understanding, which before excluded the clear light of the gospel: then the sinner receives his sight, and professes the faith which once he despised: then he passes from the kingdom of Satan to that of God; (Notes, Eph. i. 15—23, vv. 15—18. Col. i. 9—14;) and, being a new creature, he lives in a new element, and joins himself to new companions: (Note, 1 Sam. x. 10—13;) and, as he has opportunity and ability, he endeavours to recommend Jesus, the anointed Saviour and the Son of God, to the attention of his former associates in iniquity or infidelity: and this is often done with an energy of argument and persuasion, which confounds those, who are the most hardened against the truth.

V. 23—31.

While many, who witness the effects of the gospel, are amazed, only a few in comparison are effectually convinced by them. Even Saul's conversion, though it is, at this day, a real demonstration of the truth of Christianity, a fact that can neither be doubted, nor accounted for upon any other principle; even when it first took place, and when it concurred with his convincing arguments, and most stupendous miracles, could not of itself effect the conversion of one enemy to the gospel: for nothing can produce true faith, but that power which new creates the heart. (Notes and P. O. Luke xvi. 27—31.) Thus the Jews, both at Damascus and Jerusalem, rejected Saul's unexceptionable testimony, and sought to kill him; as he had sought the destruction of those who had been Christians before him!—True believers are apt to carry their suspicions too far, in respect of those against whom they have imbibed strong prejudices, and from whom they have received great injuries. Indeed the world is so full of deceit, and the visible church of hyprocrisy, that it is hard for us to be sufficiently cautious, without verging to the extreme. The Lord, however, will clear up the characters of the upright; he will bring them acquainted with his people; and give them opportunities of bearing testimony to his truth, perhaps before those, with whom they once concurred in enmity and opposition to it. He sees good to prove his churches by tribulations and persecutions: but by taking off their enemies, converting some and dismaying others, or finding them other employment, he gives seasons of rest and peace; in which we should diligently edify ourselves and each other, that we may be prepared for future trials, in ease they should be allotted us.—When believers walk conscientiously, “in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit,” they appear to be an excellent and happy people, and are generally multiplied: and it behoves us to watch against dejection or melancholy, as much as against known sin; for it prejudices the minds of unbelievers against the truth, and renders them afraid of it, as only productive of dejection and discomfort.

V. 32—43.

The unwearied labours of the primitive preachers of the gospel, should be studied and imitated, by all their successors in the ministry: and the displays of the power and grace of Christ should encourage us, in all our difficulties. He can heal our bodies or our souls, of the most inveterate maladies, whenever he pleases: his long delays do not prove that he never intends to deliver us; and he can make our tedious afflictions or temptations, and our merciful deliverances, the means of saving the souls of those around us, and of greatly displaying the glory of his power, mercy, and truth.—While we live upon the fulness of Christ, for our whole salvation, we ourselves should desire to be “full of good works and alms-deeds,” for the honour of his name and the benefit of his saints. Then those who go before us will be witnesses in heaven, and they who survive us will testify on earth, to the reality of our faith and love. (Note, Luke xvi. 9—13. Notes and P. O. 2 Cor. ix. 8—15.)—Many seem to think, that none can glorify Christ, or help to promote his gospel, except ministers: but such persons as Tabitha are as much wanted, and are as useful in their places, even as able faithful preachers: for while the latter proclaim the truths of the gospel by their word; the other substantiate, illustrate, and demonstrate the excellency of them, in their lives. How mean then is the grovelling ambition of those numerous females, who aspire to no higher distinction, than that of external personal decoration and accomplishment, and who waste their lives in trifling pursuits; when multiplied charities and labours of love, might have rendered them, at less expense of time and treasure, a blessing to multitudes, and an ornament to Christianity! When such triflers die, all dies with them, and their loss is not greatly either felt or lamented: while even such as have had little in their power, and have “laboured, working with their own hands,” that they might relieve the poor and needy, will be substantially useful through life, and “sincerely lamented at death; and” their “works follow them,” and will be graciously rewarded in heaven. We cannot expect, nor should we desire, the return to life of those who have thus “served their generation, and are fallen asleep:” yet the presenee, conversation, and prayers of faithful ministers may be a benefit to the survivors; and they should ever be ready to embrace opportunities of comforting the mourners, and giving a salutary turn to their sorrows. The Lord can make up every loss; he over-rules every event for the good of those who trust in him, and for the glory of his own name: and unostentatious piety, disinterested diligence, and indifference about outward accommodations, should mark the whole conduct of those, who preach the gospel of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. Hitherto none had been admitted, by baptism, into the Christian church, but Jews, Samaritans, and proselytes; who all were circumcised persons, and observed the ceremonial law: but the time was now come, when the gentiles were to be openly called, to share all the privileges of the people of God; without being proselyted to Judaism, either before, or after their conversion to Christianity.—The character of the person whom God was pleased to select, as the first-fruits of this harvest from among the Gentiles, was suited (as much as any thing could be,) to abate the prejudice of the Jewish converts against the alteration. Cornelius was a centurion, or the commander of a hundred men, in “the Italian band,” or cohort, of Roman soldiers, which attended the governor, who at this time generally resided at Cæsarea. (Marg. Ref. a. c.) It may be supposed, that Cornelius, if a native of Italy, would think it a trial, to be sent so far from his country and all his connexions: for the Cornelii were an illustrious family at Rome. Yet in Judea, he became acquainted with the true God; and, renouncing idolatry, he worshipped him with reverence and obedient attention. He taught his family to do the same, and was a liberal friend to the poor Jews among whom he resided; he was constant in his devotions, probably with his family, as well as in secret; and he set apart seasons for fasting and prayer, as it is reasonable to conclude, to seek further directions from God respecting his truth and will. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, xiii. 1—3. Dan. ix. 2, 3. x. 1—3. John i. 47—51, v. 48.) He was in some measure acquainted with the scriptures, and the promises of a Messiah by means of the Greek translation, as it is most probable: though it may be questioned whether he had learned to rely on him, as a spiritual Redeemer who was to come.—Many writers are very full and exact, about two sorts of proselytes to the Jewish religion; and others argue against that distinction: but the nature of the ease, and the facts recorded in scripture render it evident, that some of the Gentiles were circumcised, professed obedience to the whole Mosaick law, and were completely incorporated among the native Jews; and, that others became worshippers of the true God, and professed obedience to the moral precepts, who were not circumcised, nor observant of the ceremonial law. Of this latter description Cornelius was; and therefore considered entirely as a Gentile, though of good report among the Jews.—‘The Jews accounted them unclean as well as the other Gentiles: ... yet ... they deemed the alms they gave to the Jews clean; ... and because Cornelius was free in giving to the Jews of Cæsarea, he was a man of good report among them ‘all. (22)’ Whitby. (Notes, Matt. viii. 5—13. Luke vii. 1—10.) The promised Saviour, however, was now come, and the way of salvation by him was openly preached: it was therefore proper, that all “who feared God” should explicitly believe in him, and profess themselves his disciples. There was evidently a preparation in the heart of Cornelius, for the reception of the gospel; he had doubtless a true faith in the word of God, as far as he understood it, though he had not an explicit faith in Christ. (Note, viii. 26—31.) This preparation and faith were the fruits of the regenerating Spirit of God, who was given to him through the mediation of Jesus, even before he knew him; and this indeed is the case with every man, when “God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved him, even when dead in sin,” at first “quickens him together with Christ.” (Note, Eph. ii. 4—10, vv. 4, 5.) Had it been possible for Cornelius, in this state of mind, to have refused the salvation of Christ when proposed to him; he would not have been saved by his works: but this could not be, for God had prepared and inclined him to welcome the gospel, because he intended to call him to believe it; so that he could neither be saved without faith in Christ, nor could he perish through want of it. It is mere trifling to enquire, as many have done, what his state would have been, had he died after his prayers were heard, and before he had believed in Christ; for it goes upon the absurd supposition of the Lord’s beginning a work, and not bringing it to the intended completion. It is a universal rule, that whatever is from God, of a spiritual and holy nature, will for Christ’s sake be accepted by him: but it may be doubted whether he ever communicates regenerating grace to an adult person, where he has not given, or does not mean to send, some measure of the light of his word: though it does not behove us to limit his mercy; nor can we tell how small a portion of divine truth may be the seed or the food of divine life in the soul. This we may know certainly, that no regenerate man will finally reject the gospel, when proposed to him.—Many objections and reasonings, and much perplexity on this subject, among persons of contrary systems, seem to arise from inattention to this truth; that nothing spiritually good, or acceptable to God, can be produced from the heart of fallen man, except by the regenerating Spirit of Christ: where that is communicated, all things necessary to salvation will in due time follow; yet when, or in what order, cannot be previously ascertained. (Notes, John i. 10—13, vv. 12, 13. iii. 3—8.) But many things good, in the estimation of man, and many specious appearances of evangelical religion, are as distinct from spirituality and holiness, or the choice and love of the holy excellency of God and heavenly things; as polished brass, in its highest perfection, is different from pure gold. (Note, Luke xvi. 14, 15.) Perhaps these observations may assist the reader, in understanding this interesting chapter; which cannot easily be made to accord with the exactness of systematical writers of different creeds, on these subjects.—The Italian band. (1) ‘Many, with Grotius, have explained this, as if the meaning were, that Cornelius was a centurion of one of the cohorts belonging to the Italian legion. ... But I refer the reader to the many learned and judicious things, which Mr. Biscoe has said, (Boyle’s Lectures), to shew that the Italian legion did not exist at this time. ... I think it exceedingly probable, for the reasons which he urges, that this was a cohort different from any of the legionary ones; and consequently that Luke has here expressed himself with his usual accuracy; and that the mistake lies, as it generally does, in those who think they have learning enough to correct him. It is probable, that this was called the Italian cohort, because most of the soldiers belonging to it were Italians.’ Doddridge. Instead of generally, always would have been more proper.

Being greatly alarmed at the vision, (as probably his doors were fastened,) and aware that this was a heavenly visitant, he desired in the language of reverence, to know what was the meaning of his coming. The angel then assured him, that “his alms and prayers were come up before God” with acceptance ; who was, as it were, reminded by them of his promises and purposes to do him good. (Marg. Ref. l—p.—Notes, Ps. x. 17, 18. Prov. ii. 1—8. Is. lxii. 6, 7. Luke i. 11—17. John i. 47—51, v. 48. Rom. viii. 24—27.) He therefore was come, not to be his instructor, but to direct him to send for Peter to Joppa ; who would shew to him the way of truth and salvation, about which he was earnestly enquiring. (Note, xi. 4—17, vv. 13, 14.) Thus the angel left it to the apostle to preach the gospel to Cornelius, that the sacred ministry might be honoured, and that he might become acquainted with the disciples of Christ for his future benefit. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, by whose preaching the foundation of the church of converted Jews was laid, on the day of Pentecost, was chosen on this occasion, rather than Paul the intended apostle of the Gentiles ; probably, that the unprecedented admission of uncircumcised persons, into the church, might give as little offence to the Jewish converts as possible.—Philip, the evangelist, seems to have been at Cæsarea at this time ; yet it did not please God to employ him in the case of Cornelius, as he had done in that of the Ethiopian treasurer. (Notes, viii. 26—40.) Cornelius receiving these directions, and having pious servants and soldiers, through the influence of his example and instructions, immediately sent three messengers to Joppa, to enquire for a man, of whom he had probably never heard, before the angel made him known to him, with special directions where to find him. (ix. 43. Marg. Ref. u—z.) It does not appear, that Cornelius had the least acquaintance with the Christians at or near Cæsarea.—His intercourse with the unbelieving Jews was suited rather to increase than remove his prejudices : and, as far as it can now be judged, the reading of the Greek translation of the scriptures was the principal and almost sole means, by which effects so beneficial and excellent had been produced. (Note, viii. 32—35, v. 32.)

V. 9—16. ^a Peter, after he had received the Holy Spirit, needed to make daily proficiency, in the knowledge of the benefit of Christ. Beza. (Note, iii. 19—21.) The prejudices of Peter were so strong against uncircumcised persons, that the report of Cornelius’s vision would not have satisfied his mind, as to the propriety of going to him, unless the Lord had likewise by other means prepared him for the service. (Notes, xi. 1—18.)—When the messengers drew near to Joppa, Peter had retired for prayer to some convenient solitude, which he had upon the top of the house, it being then about noon ; for, like David and Daniel, he prayed at least three times a day. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Ps. lv. 16, 17, v. 17. Dan. vi. 10, 11.) While he was there, he became uncommonly hungry, and would gladly have eaten ; but, before his ordinary repast was ready, he fell into a trance, or ecstasy ; in which his senses were closed to external objects, but invisible things were presented to his mind, as if he saw them with his eyes. (Marg. Ref. e, d.—Notes, vii. 54—60. xxii. 17—21. 2 Cor. xii. 1—6.) In this state there appeared to him a great vessel, resembling a very large sheet, or wrapper, of which the four corners were fastened together : this seemed to come down from heaven to the earth ; and upon further observing it, he found that it contained all kinds of living creatures, especially, if not exclusively, all those animals, which were unclean according to the law. At the same time he heard a voice directing him to satisfy his hunger, by immediately killing and eating whatever he chose. To this he decidedly objected, though he supposed it to be the voice of the Lord ; as he had always observed the ritual law, in this matter, with the most scrupulous exactness. To this objection, it was replied, "What God hath cleansed," that "call not thou common," or polluted. (Marg. Ref. g—l.) To impress his mind more deeply, and to shew the certainty of the inference to be drawn from it, the transaction was thrice repeated, and then the whole vision disappeared. (Gen. xli. 32. John xxi. 17. 2 Cor. xiii. 1.)—The same law, which established the distinction between clean and unclean meats, had also marked the distinction, between Jews and Gentiles, and restricted their intercourse with each other: but the pride and bigotry of the Jews had carried the separation further than the law required; and had even produced a contempt of the Gentiles, however friendly or condescending. The law also concerning the distinction of meats and of animals had both been an emblem of the distinction between clean and unclean persons, and a means of preserving it. (Notes, Gen. vii. 2, 3. viii. 20—22. Lev. i. 1, 2. xi. 1—8. Rom. xiv. 13—18. 1 Tim. iv. 1—5.)—'Being thus separated by this precept,' (concerning clean and unclean meats,) 'from all familiar converse with other nations; hence they came to look on them, who did not use this abstinence as unclean, because they did freely eat of those things, which the law made unclean to them; and to say the unclean beasts did signify the people of the world.' Whitby.—Call not thou common. (15) ... "Do not thou pollute." Gr. 'It was the priests' office, in ease of leprosy, and other matters of a like nature, to pronounce the thing or person under examination, clean or unclean. In the Hebrew it is thus expressed, "The priest shall cleanse," ... "The priest shall pollute him." ... What God hath cleansed, that is by this vision and command declared to be clean, do not thou pollute, that is, pronounce not thou unclean.' Whitby. To inform a Jew, that God had cleansed those animals, which before had been declared unclean, and that they were no longer to be deemed common, or rejected as such, was in fact to announce the abrogation of the Mosaic law, and the introduction of another and more enlarged dispensation: and it plainly intimated, that uncircumcised Gentiles, whom God cleansed by faith and grace, were to be received into the church, without regard to the ceremonial law, or to their uncleanness according to it. (Notes, xv. 7—11. Eph. ii. 14—18. Col. ii. 13—15.)—This great vessel might therefore signify the Christian church, as living under the full revelation of the new covenant of grace, the origin of which is from heaven, though its place is on earth. Its security, by the promise, oath, and covenant of God, and the engagements of his unchangeable wisdom, power, truth, and love, may also be intimated by the vessel being knit at the four corners. The animals of various species may represent sinners of every nation, description, and previous character, as gathered into the church by the preaching of the gospel, and by faith and grace: (Note, Is. xi. 6—9:) and the voice, repeatedly addressing Peter, evidently meant, that he should thenceforth associate with converts to Christ, from among the Gentiles, and make no distinction between them and the Jewish disciples, for God had cleansed them; and that he should preach to the Gentiles, even as to the Jews, for God intended to cleanse them also. V. 17—23. Peter did not readily understand the import of this vision; though he knew that it contained some weighty instruction, which he diligently applied his mind to discover. (Marg. Ref. n.) Whilst he was thus engaged in deep reflection, the messengers of Cornelius arrived and enquired for him: but to satisfy his mind more fully, in a case that implied in its consequences the abolition of the ritual law, which God himself had given to Israel, this fact was immediately revealed to him; and he was ordered to go with the messengers without scruple or hesitation.—God had directed Cornelius by the angel, to send these messengers, yet "the Spirit said to Peter, "I have sent them:" this is the language of Deity and personality. (20. Marg. Ref. q—s.) Accordingly Peter, having heard their report concerning Cornelius's character and vision, (Notes, 1, 2. Job i. 1,) hospitably entertained

V. 24—26. Cornelius, expecting a satisfactory discovery of the divine will from Peter, had collected his relations and intimate friends, (who, though Gentiles, were previously disposed to receive instruction, even as he was,) that they might share the benefit. (Marg. Ref. f. 33.) Peter had been made known to him in so extraordinary a manner, that Cornelius seems to have supposed, he must be something more than man: perhaps he thought that he was the Messiah, of whom he had read such glorious things in the writings of the prophets. He, however, prostrated himself before the apostle, and rendered him such homage, as Peter deemed improper to be received by any one, who was only a man like himself; and therefore he resolutely rejected it: yet Jesus continually accepted of the very same. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Matt. xiv. 33. xv. 25—28. Mark v. 21—24.)—‘If the worship, intended and given by Cornelius, was religious worship, ... Peter declares such worship was not to be given to a mere man: if it was only civil worship; he who thought it not fit to receive that, would much less have received religious worship.’ Whitby. ‘Religious worship belongs to God alone; but civil and immoderate must not be rendered even to apostles, when present, much less when absent, and dead; and much less to their tombs. ... If Cornelius had desired to kiss Peter’s toe, would Peter have allowed him? Yet truly it is Peter’s vicegerent, who requires kings to kiss his slipper!’ Beza. (Notes, Rev. xix. 9, 10. xxii. 8, 9.)

V. 27—33. When Peter had entered the house, in which so many uncircumcised persons were collected; he observed to them, that they knew it to be contrary to the law of Moses, for a Jew to associate with those of another nation; but God had shewed him, that this distinction was no longer to be strictly adhered to. (Marg. Ref. i.—) He had therefore come to them without saying any thing to the contrary; and he now desired to be more particularly informed, on what account he had been sent for. Upon which Cornelius repeated the substance of his vision; (Marg. Ref. o—s.—Note, 3—8;) expressed his satisfaction in his having come to them so readily; and assured him that he and his friends were met together, as in the immediate presence of God, and prepared to give an implicit assent and a cordial welcome to the divine message which he was about to deliver, whatever it might be. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, xvii. 10—15. Jer. xlii. 1—6. 20—22.) The circumstances, preceding Peter’s coming to Cornelius and his friends, rendered an implicit faith in his words most reasonable and proper, even previous to a comparison of them with the sacred oracles, the standard and test of truth.—Unlawful. (28) Note, 9—16.—The unlawfulness of the Jews associating with uncircumcised persons, and those who did not observe the ritual law, seems to have been generally inferred from the restriction laid on such intercourse, by the distinction of meats

V. 34, 35. The circumstances of this transaction so impressed the apostle's mind, that he opened his discourse by allowing, that he had been erroneously prejudiced, in favour of the Jews, and against the Gentiles: for he was now convinced, that " God was no respecter of persons."—" To respect persons," is entirely different from discriminating characters, or conferring unmerited favours on one man, and not on another. A judge respects persons, if he condemns one and acquits another, or decides in favour of the injurious party, from partiality to his friend, or to one of his own nation, sect, or party: (Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, Deut. x. 17. Matt. xxii. 15—22, v. 16:) yet in private life, he may send a present to what friend he pleases, or dispense his alms to what poor persons he chooses, without giving others a ground for charging him with " respect of persons." (Note, Matt. xx. 1—16, v. 15.) If God had accepted a man's worship because he was a Jew, and rejected that of another man, of exactly the same dispositions and character, because he was a Gentile; there would have been some reason to assert, that he was " a respecter of persons:" but if he had favoured a proud, wicked, or hypocritical Jew, merely on account of his circumcision, or relation to Abraham; and rejected a humble, pious, believing, sincere worshipper, because of his uncircumcision, or his gentile extraction; there would have been an evident ground for the charge. Yet the Jews in general carried their ideas of God's special favour to their nation so far, as fully to involve these consequences. It does not however follow that God will accept from any man that service, which is destitute of spiritual good; or that any man will do what is spiritually good, without ' regenerat- ing grace;' or that God is bound in justice to give his special grace to an unconverted man, because of his external decency of character, or formal services; or that he may not confer this unmerited favour on any one, as he sees good, without " respecting persons;" or that the fruits of grace can claim, or meet acceptance, on any other ground, than that of the covenant of mercy, through the righteousness and atonement of our divine Surety. In short, where the essence of true religion is found, God graciously accepts it without regarding names, forms, or sects. So that, " in every nation, he that feareth God " and worketh righteousness is accepted of him:" for this, when genuine, comprises the substance of true religion, and constitutes the evidence, though not the meritorious cause, of a man's acceptance; and, whatever may yet be wanting in his explicit knowledge and faith, will in due time be communicated. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, Job xxxiv. 16—19. Gal. ii. 6—10. 1 Pet. i. 17—22.)—" I think ' this text proves that God would sooner send an angel to direct pious and upright persons to the knowledge of the ' gospel, than suffer them to perish by ignorance of it. ' But so far from intimating that such persons may be ' found among those that reject Christianity, ... it deter- mines nothing as to their existence in every nation.' Dod- dridge. (Notes, Rom. ii. 7—16.) Does universal history, ancient and modern, bring to our knowledge one person, who without revelation, in some way or degree, was a humble penitent, a spiritual worshipper of God, a conscientious worker of righteousness, in his habitual conduct; in one word a Cornelius? If it do not, all advanced from this passage about virtuous heathens is wholly foreign to the purpose. Their virtue was not and is not good ' be- fore God.'

municate. This indeed would scarcely have been necessary, if Cornelius had been so "accepted" for his good works, as not to need the righteousness and atonement of Christ; or if, as numbers argue, every man might be saved by his own religion, if sincere in it. But his prayers for instruction, being accompanied by obedience and good fruits, according to his present light, were accepted, and in consequence, the only way of salvation was made known unto him, and his heart was prepared to welcome it. (Notes, 1, 2. xi. 4—18.)—Peter, in calling the attention of the company to his subject, observed that they had doubtless known something about the preaching of "Jesus of Nazareth," and the reports which had been circulated concerning him; though their information had been imperfect and unfavourable. Now these reports, properly understood, contained that very instruction which God had sent him to deliver; even the word, which he had some time before sent to the Jews, preaching reconciliation to himself, and peace with each other, by this Jesus, who was the promised Messiah; the anointed Saviour and King of Israel; yea, "the Lord of all" men, whether Jews or Gentiles; of all creatures whether men or angels, and of all worlds, even of all things in heaven, earth, and hell; both in respect of his divine nature, as the incarnate Son of God, and as the Mediator between God and man, the Law-giver, Governor, and Judge of all: for so the words, "this Person is Lord of all," evidently mean. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Matt. xxviii. 18. Rom. xiv. 7—12. 1 Cor. xv. 45—49. Eph. i. 15—23. ii. 14—22. Phil. ii. 9—11. 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22.) The apostle declared, that he came to confirm that doctrine, which they knew had been published throughout all Judea; though it was first more stately preached in Galilee, after John had prepared the way for it by his ministry and baptism. This doctrine implied, that God had "anointed Jesus with the "Holy Spirit," in an evident manner, at his baptism, when he had declared him to be his "beloved Son in "whom he was well pleased;" (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Note, Matt. iii. 16, 17;) and had endued him, as Man, with that divine power, which he exercised "in going about "doing good," and performing all kinds of miraculous cures; especially delivering those who were oppressed by evil spirits, as an emblem of his rescuing sinners from the yoke and service of Satan: for God was evidently with him, as appeared by the authority and beneficence of his miracles. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, Luke iv. 16—19. John iii. 1, 2. v. 31—38.) To this, Peter and the other apostles were appointed to bear witness; as they had been his constant attendants, and the spectators of these interesting scenes: till at length, the Jewish rulers, hating the holy doctrine, and envying the reputation of Jesus, had seized him, and condemned him to death as a deceiver; and had procured the execution of their sentence from Pilate: so that he had been most cruelly and ignomi-

ously crucified as a malefactor. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, ii. 22—24. iii. 12—16. iv. 5—12.) But, though it had pleased God, for most wise and gracious purposes, to permit their malice to proceed thus far; he had yet raised him from the dead, and "shewn him openly" after his resurrection: not indeed to all the people, whose conduct had rendered them unworthy of such a favour; neither would that method have been so convincing and satisfactory to all those, in every age and nation, who were concerned in this event; (Note, John xx. 24—29, latter part;) but to a competent number of witnesses, whom he had before chosen for that purpose; even to the twelve apostles, and many others, who had seen, conversed, eaten, and drunk with him, after he arose from the dead. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, Luke xxiv. 36—43. John xxi. 1—14.) He had also commanded them to preach these things to mankind: and to assure them, that he, who was then proposed to them as a Saviour, was ordained by God, to be the Judge of those, who should at the last day be found living on earth, and of the innumerable multitudes which would then be raised from the dead. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Note, xvii. 30, 31.)—These things indeed were no other, than what had been predicted in the scriptures, with which Cornelius and his friends were become in some measure acquainted: and in due time they would see, that the several particulars relating to the person, character, miracles, doctrine, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, were an exact accomplishment of ancient prophecies; and that all the prophets, in one way or other, bore witness to him, and directed mankind to expect acceptance through his righteousness and sacrifice: so that whosoever of any nation or description believed in him, should receive a free and complete remission of all his sins. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, iii. 24—26. Luke xxiv. 25—31. 44—49. John v. 39—44. Rev. xix. 9, 10.) This should be considered as only an abstract of Peter's discourse; and as he was interrupted in it by the descent of the Holy Spirit, we need not wonder, that various points of Christian doctrine are not explicitly stated in it; for they were left to be communicated afterwards, and by degrees. (Notes, vii. 1—8. 51—53. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 20.)

V. 44—48. (Note, xi. 4—17.) It does not appear that the descent of the Holy Spirit, on this occasion, was accompanied by the same circumstances, as on the day of Pentecost: but the effects were evident, and similar to those which were then produced. (Notes, ii. 2—4.) The Gentile converts were immediately enabled to speak in languages, which they had not previously learned; and to magnify God, and celebrate, with adoring gratitude, the glory displayed in the work of redemption. (Marg. Ref. z—c.) As they were thus undeniably baptized with the Holy Spirit, poured out upon them; not only by his illuminating, sanctifying, and comforting influences, but by his miraculous gifts also; Peter justly conclude^d, that it would be unreasonable to refuse them the baptism of water: and when none of his companions could say any thing against it, he ordered them to be baptized, by some of those who attended him. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, i. 4—8. Matt. iii. 11, 12.)—Forbid water, &c. (47) ‘These words contain a plain and convincing demonstration of the falsehood of the Quaker’s doctrine, that water-baptism is unnecessary to them, who have received the inward baptism of the Spirit: since the apostle here not only declares, that water-baptism ought therefore to be administered to these persons, because they had already been baptized with the Holy Ghost; but also commands them to be baptized upon that account.’ Whitby.—It was not necessary for the sacred historian, on such occasions, to repeat the appointed form of Christian baptism; and therefore the special confession of Jesus, as the Messiah, the Son of God, is alone noticed. But there seems no ground to doubt, that the form also was adhered to. Some learned men conjecture, that when Jews, who had before believed in the Father and in the Holy Spirit, were baptized, it was only in the name of the Son: but that the Gentile converts were baptized “into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.” This, however, is merely conjecture, and very improbable: for not the least trace of it is found in scripture; nor any difference marked, between the form of baptizing Jewish and gentile converts. It is rather taken for granted, that the apostles and primitive teachers, adhered to the instruction of their Lord just before his ascension; and it was therefore needless to mention that circumstance in the narrative. (Note, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 19.)—It is not said that the brethren who accompanied Peter, were pastors; but it is probable, that some of them were. There had been Christians at Joppa for a considerable time: and either those who first collected a church in that city, appointed pastors; or Peter, when he went thither, “set in order this which was wanting.” (Note, Tit. i. 5—9.) Now it is most natural to suppose, that on so interesting an occasion, Peter would take with him, as witnesses, some of the pastors of the church, and not exclusively private Christians. Ananias is not said to have been a minister, or pastor; yet it can scarcely be doubted that he was.—The apostle, however, seems to have devolved the service of baptizing the Gentile converts on his attendants; perhaps for the same reasons, which the apostle Paul assigned, on an occasion in some respects similar. (Notes, John iv. 1—4. 1 Cor. i. 10—19.)—To tarry, &c. (48.) It cannot be supposed, but that Peter lived with these converted Gentiles, according to their usual habits, as to eating, and other things of that nature, after all which had preceded his going among them, without any special regard to the ceremonial law. This may be of use, if recollected, in forming our judgment on some other portions of this history. (Notes, xxi. 17—26. 1 Cor. ix. 19—23. Gal. ii. 11—16. iv. 12—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Pure and undefiled religion is sometimes found, where it might least have been expected: (P. O. Matt. viii. 5—13:) and “the vessels of mercy” are often brought acquainted with God, by means of which at the time they know not the consequence, and which perhaps thwart their inclinations, and disappoint their schemes of future life.—“The saving grace of God teaches” men to “worship him with reverence and godly fear,” to serve him conscientiously, to unite justice and charity, and to pray with constancy and perseverance. It leads men to order their households in the fear of God; and commonly they become instrumental to the good of those around them. (P. O. Gen. xviii. 16—22. Josh. xxiv. 14—33.) This Roman soldier was more like “a son of Abraham,” even before he became a Christian, than most of that patriarch’s lineal descendants were; and doubtless he will rise up in judgment against numbers of nominal Christians, and even professors of evangelical truth. Yet all this diligence, liberality, equity, piety, and self-denial, could not have saved him, without the atonement of Christ: even he must be accepted, and admitted into heaven, in the same way with Saul the persecutor, with the converted jailor, and the thief upon the cross; “that no flesh should glory in the presence of God.” What then will become of those

CHAP. XI.

Peter is blamed by those of the circumcision, for going among the Gentiles, 1—3. He satisfies them, by relating the whole transaction; and they “glorify God, who had given to the Gentiles repentance unto life,” 4—18. The gospel having spread to Phenice,

Cyprus, and Antioch, 19—21; Barnabas is sent to Antioch, who rejoices over the converts, and exhorts them to persevere, 22—24. He goes to fetch Saul from Tarsus, and many are instructed at Antioch, where the disciples are first called Christians, 25, 26. Agabus foretels a famine; and the disciples at Antioch send relief to their brethren in Judea, by Barnabas and Saul, 27—30.

who, without one tenth of the external appearance of his piety and charity, presume that they shall go to heaven on the score of their good works, and reject the way of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ? But where these things are genuine, they are always attended with a humble, teachable, and enquiring disposition: and those who practise what they know, without being proud of it, or trusting to it, and who at the same time wait upon God for further teaching, by faith and prayer, shall never perish for want of instruction. (Note, John vii. 14—17.) Should the Lord create such a disposition in the heart of an inhabitant of China, Japan, or the unexplored parts of Africa; he would sooner send an angel from heaven, or a minister from the uttermost part of the earth, to shew him the way of salvation, than leave him destitute of that knowledge, for which he longs and prays without ceasing. The alms and supplications of such persons spring from right principles and motives, and go “up as a memorial before God;” not to merit his favour, but to plead with him to fulfil his gracious promises.—The sublime subjects, which pertain to redemption through the blood of the Son of God, seem more proper for the tongues of angels to proclaim, than for us poor worms of the earth. Doubtless in many respects, they could preach them unspeakably better: yet our humiliating and thankful experience may balance something on the other side. In that case, however, it would not be so evident, that “the excellency of the power,” which makes the word successful, is wholly “of God:” nor would their presence and language be so suited to man’s weakness, or so conducive to his comfort.—The Lord knows where, and about what, his servants are employed; and when he has further work for them, he will surely by one means or other shew it to them.—Implicit obedience tends to increasing light and comfort: and pious servants or attendants are a great blessing, which we should seek from God, use proper means to obtain, and express a proper value for when they are granted to us.

V. 9—23.

The thoughts and ways of the Lord are far above our’s: the best of men are seldom entirely free from some remaining prejudices; even those who were infallibly guided by the Holy Spirit, to declare the doctrine of Christ to mankind, were gradually let into the secret designs of God, and delivered from their mistakes and prejudices, as it became needful. How absurdly then do they act, who aim and expect to put the new convert, at once, into full possession of that whole system, which perhaps they themselves have been learning for years!—The Lord may command his servants, without assigning his reasons: but he generally satisfies them, about the propriety of those services to which he calls them; and their constancy and fervency in prayer very much conduce to it. (Note, John xv. 12—16.)—When pious persons conscientiously deny themselves, in obedience to what they deem the command of God, without self-righteousness or spiritual pride; their conduct may evidence their sincerity, and exhibit to others a very useful example; even should it appear that they were mistaken in their scruples: and in this view, the apostle’s readiness to endure hunger rather than eat forbidden food, and his scrupulous exactness in this respect, during his whole past life, convey to us important and humiliating instructions. (Notes, Dan. i. 8—16. P. O. 8—20.)—The company of those, who are collected together into the church of God, and secured by the covenant of grace, are previously of very different characters and dispositions; yet all alike estranged from God and holiness. But when they are truly converted, they become all of “one mind and judgment,” in the grand concerns of religion: they have the same faith, hope, and love, and the same motives and distinguishing principles; and their several natural dispositions, being corrected, regulated, and moderated by sanctifying grace, render them more qualified in different ways to serve the common cause of the gospel. (P. O. Is. xi. 1—9.) Let us then learn “not to call those common” whom God has cleansed, or to despise those whom he has received; and not to neglect or despair of those, whom he may yet call to the knowledge of himself.—If we diligently endeavour to discover the meaning of his word; the dispensations of his providence, and our own experience will often throw light upon it; and, without any immediate revelation, we shall be directed and encouraged to proceed in the path of duty, “nothing doubting.” But how strong must prejudice be, when so many divine monitions were requisite, to induce an apostle to attend on a man of fair character and good report, who by the warning of an angel had sent for him, that he might receive the instructions of life from his lips!

V. 24—43.

Those who love the truth will desire to bring their friends, and especially their relations, acquainted with it, and will diligently use their influence with them for that purpose.—While numbers despise the servants of God, some will honour them in an improper manner: and it becomes them decidedly to refuse undue and excessive respect; for humility and modesty are the peculiar ornaments of piety.—Alas! how seldom are we called to speak to auditories, however small, in which it may be said, that “they are all present in the sight of God, to hear all things that are commanded us of God!”—Whatever men may assert or object, it will be found, “that God is no respecter of persons:” and if any do not see the consistency of this with evangelical truth, or the sovereignty of his dispensations; let them learn to admit, that it is wholly owing to their narrow capacities, and the proud and carnal self-love of their own hearts. For God does not limit his conduct by the rules, or according to the systems of bigotted or prejudiced persons: he gives grace to whom he pleases, and as he sees best; and the fruits of that grace always meet with his acceptance, through the mercy of the covenant and the merits of the great Mediator. When he begins, he will carry on his work: and by whatever way he leads sinners to heaven, they will be prepared to join the chorus of the Redeemed, in singing “salvation to God and the Lamb.” That preventing grace, which leads men to fervent prayer and conscientious obedience, is not given to supersede the gospel, but to render men willing to embrace it. The minister of Christ must therefore declare to sinners of every character, that word, which God has sent to men, “preaching peace by Jesus Christ,” “the Prince of peace” and “the Lord of all;” by whom alone they can be saved, and to whom they must at length submit, in one way or other. Many serious enquirers hear reports of this doctrine, but these come to them, so distorted and misrepresented, that they are for a long time set against it: and they are astonished, when, in answer to their prayers, the Lord leads them to hear and receive his truth, from the very persons against whom they have been so greatly prejudiced; and when they find their doctrine so different in its nature and tendency from what they supposed, and so exactly suited to their wants and desires.—While we consider the effects of our Redeemer’s immeasurable unction by the Holy Spirit; let us endeavour to copy his example, being unwearied in doing good, and in promoting the deliverance of our fellow-sinners from the oppression of Satan, by all the means which we can devise: thus it will appear that “God is with us,” whatever men may say of us or do to us.—Receiving the testimony of apostles and prophets to the efficacy of his sacrifice, and the free remission of our sins through faith in his name; let us daily prepare to meet him, as the constituted Judge of the living and of the dead; and “be diligent to be found of him in peace without spot and blameless.” (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 14—16. P. O. 14—18.)

V. 44—48.

When we endeavour to mix faith with the word of God, and to yield obedience to it; we may expect to be more fully illuminated, sanctified, and comforted, by the gift of the Holy Spirit: that, through “the love of God” being “shed abroad in our hearts,” we may use our tongues to celebrate his praises. This inward baptism of the Spirit is especially to be valued; yet outward ordinances should not be neglected: and those who conclude that they have no occasion for the external signs, because they have received the internal grace of the covenant, speak and act in a very unscriptural manner, and give reason for suspecting that they deceive themselves: yet if we have both the ‘outward sign and the inward and spiritual grace,’ it is not of much importance, in what order we have received them. Those who have learned and experienced the things of God, will desire the further company of his ministers, to build them up in their most holy faith.—But surely, we sinners of the gentiles should read this chapter with peculiar gratitude and admiring praise: thus the partition-wall was broken down, the law of ordinances that was against us was abolished, the door of mercy was opened to us; that we might become fellow heirs with the ancient people of God, in all the blessings of his covenant and salvation. (Notes and P. O. Eph. ii. 11—22.) May the Lord speedily recall the Jews into the church, and bring in “the fulness of the Gentiles;” that “his name may be hallowed,” his kingdom established, and “his will done,” throughout the whole earth, as it is by all the angels and saints in heaven!

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—3 The dissatisfaction of the believers, who “were of the circumcision,” when they heard of Cornelius’s conversion, and Peter’s conduct respecting him, emphatically illustrates the degree, in which the Jews were prejudiced against the Gentiles, even when they appeared to worship God alone, and were exemplary in their general conduct; unless they were circumcised, and became obedient to the Mosaic law. If the believers from among the Jews, were so alarmed and offended at Peter, for eating, on such an occasion, with persons of so good a report as Cornelius and his friends; what must have been the thoughts of the Jews in general, concerning the state of the idolatrous and licentious Gentiles? (Note, x. 34, 35.)—It is not said that “the apostles contended” with Peter on this account: yet, if the general opinion had not been unfavourable to his conduct, none would have publicly called him to an account, or have warmly contested the point with him.—This fact is likewise an unanswerable proof, that the primitive church had no idea of Peter’s supremacy and infallibility: indeed, the persons concerned by no means rendered due respect to his apostolical authority.

exemptions; but with a becoming candour and frankness, stated the whole transaction to his brethren, and thus vindicated what he had done, beyond all possibility of objection. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, x. 9—48.)—Not so, &c. V. 18. The clear discovery of the express purpose of God, which appeared in all the circumstances of the transaction, overpowered the prejudices of the objectors; and they could not but admire and adore his grace, which had opened a way even to the gentiles to obtain eternal life, when they repented, and forsook idolatry and wickedness, and “turned to God” and his worship and service; and which had given to some of them “repentance unto life.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, x. 24—26. xv. 7—11.)—It may hence be inferred, that even the disciples did not before consider the professed repentance of a gentile, however attended with “works meet for repentance,” to be acceptable with God, unless it led him unreservedly to embrace the religion of the Jews. This proves, that many things, which learned men have stated concerning the proselytes of the gate, and their privileges, rather shew what ought to have been the case, than what it really was.—Dr. Whitby has here a long note, to evince, that the language of this verse and of similar passages, which state, that repentance and faith are the gift of God, does not imply that they are not conditional, and that they give encouragement to those alone, who perform the conditions; in which important truths are contained, but blended, as it appears to me, with much error.—That repentance and faith, and every kind of obedience, are the duties of every man; that means should be used, by such as desire to perform these duties; and that none receive the gift and grant of God, who live and die in the neglect of the appointed means of grace; are propositions not in the least to be contested. But this learned divine, and many others, seem to forget, that “the heart of stone,” “the uncircumcised heart,” “the carnal mind which is enmity against God,” effectually prevents every man from doing these duties, or properly using those means. or even

Hence it is “God, who worketh in us to will,” as well as to do. ‘We have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.’ Art. x.—‘They blessed God, ... that he had afforded the same mercy to the gentiles, as to the Jews, that if they will return and amend, and receive Christ, they shall be saved; and that he had given them the grace to do so.’ Hammond.—‘He has not only made them the overtures of it; but has graciously wrought it in some of their hearts.’ Doddridge.—The inseparable connexion of repentance and eternal life should not pass unnoticed, in this place. V. 19—21. (Marg. Ref. l—s.) The words here translated “preaching,” do not necessarily imply a publick and authoritative proclamation. (Notes, viii. 4. 32—35.) “Speaking the word to none, but unto the Jews only.” “They spake unto the Grecians, declaring the glad tidings concerning the Lord Jesus.”—‘As in this place the Hellenists are opposed to the Jews; and as the church of Antioch was, as it were, a new Jerusalem for the gentiles; it appears, that under this term, those were included, ... who had so far profited by their acquaintance with the dispersed Jews, that, condemning idolatry, they acknowledged God, who had spoken by Moses and the prophets, though they remained uncircumcised; of which description Cornelius was, as it is evident from the preceding history.’ Beza.—‘Instead of Ἑλληνιστας, Hellenists, the Alexandrian manuscript, which is favoured by the Syriaek and some other ancient versions, reads Ἕλληνας, Greeks; which common sense would require us to adopt, even if it were not supported by the authority of any manuscript at all. For as the Hellenists were Jews, there would, on the received reading, be no opposition between the conduct of these preachers, and those mentioned in the preceding verse. Here undoubtedly we have the first account of preaching the gospel to the idolatrous gentiles: for it is certain, there is nothing in the word Ἕλληνας, to limit it to such as were worshippers of the true God. ... As the Greeks were the most celebrated of the gentile nations near Judca, the Jews called all the gentiles by that general name. (Rom. x. 12. Gal. iii. 28. Col. iii. 11.)’ Doddridge.—It would, in my mind, be far preferable to leave the point undecided, or even to adopt Beza’s exposition; than to alter the text, ‘without the authority of any manuscript:’ for who can say, how far men may proceed in altering the scriptures by conjectural criticisms, pleading at the same time, that ‘common sense requires it?’ This, however, is not here the case, for there is good ground to conclude, that Greeks is the genuine reading.—The distance of Antioch and Cyprus from Jerusalem renders it probable, that no worshippers of God, according to the law, except “Grecians,” or Jews using the Greek and not the Hebrew or Syriaek language, and reading the Greek translation of the scriptures in their synagogues, resided in those parts: (Note, vi. 1:) and if there were synagogues of Jews, who used the Hebrew or Syriaek, no good reason can be assigned, why the word of God should be spoken to them only, and not to their brethren, who differed from them in nothing but language. It is, therefore, highly probable, that the persons spoken of, for a considerable time, addressed none but Jews and circumcised proselytes: but that at length, the report of Cornelius’s conversion having reached Antioch, which cannot be shewn to have been even improbable; some of them were encouraged to preach to uncircumcised persons also: and their great success, by the immediate power of the Lord, accompanying the word, gave a divine sanction to their proceedings. Upon the whole it is most likely, that at Antioch, and about this time, the gospel was first preached to idolatrous gentiles.—Was not the extraordinary success of the word, and the holy effects which followed by “the hand of the Lord,” as real a sanction, both to the mission of the preachers, and to their conduct in preaching to the gentiles, as outward miracles would have been?—Hand, &c. (21) Marg. Ref. t.—No miracles are mentioned, and the inward power of divine grace, teaching, inclining, and aiding the hearers to believe, seems exclusively meant.—Believed, &c.] *Marg. Barnabas was sent by the apostles, as it may be supposed, to examine on the spot into the nature and effects of that success, which had attended the gospel at Antioch; and to set in order such things as related to the appointment of pastors, and the administration of sacred ordinances to the new converts; perhaps to baptize them, and so “add them to the church.” (24. Note, viii. 14—17.)

23 Who when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord.

24 For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord.

25 Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul:

26 And when he had found him he brought him unto Antioch.

And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.

27 ¶ And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch.

28 And there stood up one of them, named Agabus, and signified by the Spirit, that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar.

Ref. a.—Notes, Mark ii. 3—12, v. 5. 1 Thes. i. 1—4, vv. 3, 4.) But he was aware that their faith would be assaulted by manifold temptations and persecutions; and that those who had been gentiles would be discouraged, through the prejudices of their Jewish brethren: he therefore exhorted, encouraged, and besought them, by every argument and motive which he could devise, "to cleave to "the Lord" Jesus, or abide with him, by a continued exercise of faith, a bold profession of his name, and implicit obedience to his commandments; whatever they might be called to renounce or suffer for his sake. (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Notes, xiv. 21—23. John viii. 30—36. xv. 3—11.) For "he was a good man," a person of remarkable affection, philanthropy, and genuine candour; as well as eminent for the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, and the exercise of a vigorous faith in the midst of danger and persecution. So that, through his labours, and those of the other teachers, great accessions were made to the number of Christians at Antioch; and a flourishing church was planted there, from which preachers were afterwards sent forth to evangelize the nations. V. 25, 26. As so large and encouraging a sphere of usefulness was unexpectedly opened, in this great and populous city, Barnabas went from thence to Tarsus, that he might procure the assistance of Saul: (Note, ix. 23—30:) and, having prevailed with him to accompany him, they laboured together at Antioch for a whole year, in further instructing the numerous converts, and in reducing the church to order and regularity, as well as in preaching the gospel to the unconverted inhabitants. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i.)—Nothing is recorded of the apostle's success at Tarsus. (Note, Matt. xiii. 54—58.) There were, however, churches in Cilicia. (Note, xv. 36—41.)—Were called Christians. (26) "It came to pass that they" (Paul and Barnabas) "called the disciples Christians." This is indisputably the natural construction of the verse.—But the word implies that this was done by divine revelation: for it has generally this signification in the New Testament, and is rendered "warned from God," or "warned of God," even when there is no word for God in the Greek. 'The believing Jews and Gentiles, being made 'one church, that the name of Jew and heathen might no 'more continue the distance that was betwixt them, this 'new name was given to them both; as some conceive 'according to the prophecy mentioned, Is. lxxv. 15.' Whitby. Their enemies had hitherto called them Nazarenes, or Galileans: and if they had devised some other opprobrious name, they would, probably, have derived it from the word JESUS, rather than from CHRIST, or the MESSIAH, which they would never allow the crucified Nazarene to be. On the other hand, the disciples had called each other "brethren," "believers," and "saints," which names were not sufficiently distinguishing: but the word Christian, aptly denoted their reliance on that anointed Prince and Saviour, who was generally rejected with disdain by Jews and Gentiles: it also implied, that they were partakers of an unction by the Holy Spirit. Doubtless it was afterwards used as a term of reproach by their persecutors, though it was so honourable in its meaning and original. At present it is applied promiscuously to so vast and heterogeneous a multitude, that it scarcely implies either honour or reproach: and those who seriously profess to believe and obey Christ are generally distinguished by other names, whether they are spoken of with respect, or in derision. (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.)

Roman empire was ostentatiously called. (Note, Luke ii. 1.) Some indeed would explain it of the land of Judea and Galilee: but the expression is incapable of that meaning: and the famine might be very general, and severely felt in the various provinces of the empire; though some places might be less straitened than others.—Eusebius saith of this famine, that it oppressed almost the whole empire; and that it was recorded by historians most averse to our religion; viz. by Suetonius, in the life of Claudius, who saith, it happened (ob assiduas sterilitates) through a long barrenness. Josephus saith that it raged so much in Judea, ... that many perished for want of victuals: and Dion Cassius, that it was a very great famine.' Whitby.—The believers at Antioch, which was a rich and trading city, were more affluent than those in Judea; who had also impoverished themselves, by selling their estates after the day of Pentecost. For these reasons, and probably because the Gentile converts wished to conciliate the affections of their Jewish brethren; they determined to make a collection, in proportion to their gain in trade, or from their estates, and to send a sum of money to relieve the poor Christians in Judea. (Marg. Ref. p. q.—Notes, Rom. xv. 22—29. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2.) Barnabas and Saul were entrusted to carry these first-fruits, of the faith and love of the gentile converts, to Jerusalem: and as, probably, most of the apostles were absent, preaching the gospel in other places, they delivered the money to the "elders," that they might entrust it to the deacons to be distributed. This is the first time "elders" are mentioned in the church of Christ; but we shall have more favourable opportunities, of considering several questions relative to their office: (Note, xx. 17:) without doubt they were pastors of the Christian church; and as both Peter and John call themselves Elders, (1 Pet. v. 1, 2. 2 John 1,) it is not clear that the apostles were not included. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

The imperfection of human nature, even in its best estate, appears, when pious persons are offended and grieved at those things, which should excite in them the most lively joy and gratitude. Sometimes true believers are displeased to hear, even of the word of God being preached and received, because the peculiarities of their own church, sect, or system, have not been adhered to: and they are ready to find fault with the Lord's plan of bringing sinners to repentance, and faith in Christ, and with those who execute it; because their own plan and prejudices have been broken in upon. (Notes, Jon. iv. 1—4. Mark ix. 38—40. Luke ix. 46—50, v. 50.) Hence it is, that the zealous servant of God may expect to be censured, on account of those very things, in which his Master has peculiarly prospered him, and by those whom he most esteems and loves! We should, however, meekly bear with the infirmities of our brethren: and, instead of taking offence, or answering with warmth, we ought candidly to explain our motives, and shew the nature of our proceedings, in order to satisfy and conciliate their minds.—It behoves every one to remember who and what he is: and while men are very zealous for their own regulations, they should take care, that they do not "withstand God," or prescribe other terms of admission among them, than he has appointed for admission into his church; lest they should reject and grieve those who have believed in Christ, and received the gift and the baptism of the Holy Spirit, even as they have.—Men of piety and candour, though they have been prejudiced, will be satisfied with a proper answer, and a sufficient explanation and reason: and those who love the Lord will glorify him, when they are certified that he "hath given repentance unto life," even to the most abject of their fellow-sinners. (Notes and P. O. Luke xv. 1—10. 25—32.)

V. 19—30.

When the Lord Jesus is preached in simplicity, and according to the scripture; his power will attend the word to give it success: and when sinners are brought "to believe, and turn unto the Lord;" "good men," who are "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," will discern, admire, and rejoice in the grace of God bestowed upon them; and exhort all, who profess the gospel, "to cleave to the Lord" Jesus "with purpose of heart," knowing how many efforts Satan and his servants will employ to draw them aside. Where a prospect of great usefulness appears, they will bestow pains, to procure the assistance of the most able and zealous ministers, though themselves should be thus eclipsed: and while such men proceed with one heart in the work, believers will be encouraged in assembling together, in order to their edification and establishment.—We, at this day, are called by the name given to these ancient disciples: may we be anointed with the same Spirit, and walk in their steps! A Christian is a member of Christ's mystical body, a temple of the Holy Spirit, an adopted child of God, an anointed king and priest unto him, and an heir of everlasting glory. (Note, 1 John ii. 20—25.) May we be ambitious of these honours, which belong to all his saints! may we "walk worthy of this vocation, wherewith we are called!" and may 'all, who call themselves Christians, ' be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith, in unity ' of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of ' life!' Such Christians will sympathize with their brethren in all their afflictions: the various dispensations of Providence will give them opportunity of shewing their love, by distributing according to their ability to "the necessity of the saints:" thus God will be glorified, the

3 And because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also. Then were the days of unleavened bread.

4 And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers to keep him: intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people.

5 Peter therefore was kept in prison; but prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him.

6 And when Herod would have brought him forth, the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains: and the keepers before the door kept the prison.

7 And, behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light harmony among believers promoted, the faith and hope of the poor encouraged, their prayers and praises excited; and fruit brought forth, which will abound to the account of those by whom it is produced. (Note and P. O. 2 Cor. ix. 8—15.) The wisdom of this world indeed would earnestly plead, in the prospect of a famine, the propriety of hoarding for ourselves and families, against the emergency; and doubtless frugality, as distinguished from avarice, is not only prudent, but an incumbent duty: yet "the wisdom from above" will teach us, in such circumstances especially, to "lend to the LORD" by giving liberally to his needy servants, and to trust him, when the time comes, to provide for us and our's, in his own manner and measure. (Notes and P. O. ii. 42—47.—Note, Jam. iii. 17, 18.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—4. This Herod, surnamed Agrippa, was grandson to Herod the Great, by Aristobulus; nephew to Herod Antipas who slew John the Baptist; brother to Herodias his incestuous paramour; and father to king Agrippa, of whom we shall read hereafter. (Notes, xxv. 13—27. xxvi. Matt. xiv. 1—5.) The emperor Caligula made him tetrarch of Galilee; and Claudius afterwards made him king of Judea, because he had been serviceable to him in obtaining the empire. Judea had been before, and was again soon after, under the dominion of a Roman governor. Herod being invested with his new dignity, endeavoured by all means to ingratiate himself with the Jews: and this probably combined with his hereditary enmity to the gospel, in exciting him to persecute the church. He seems to have harassed the Christians for some time, before he attacked the apostles: but at length he seized on James, the son of Zebedee, and immediately ordered him to be beheaded. (Marg. Ref. a—e.) Thus was he baptized with the baptism of his Lord, as it had been predicted; (Note, Matt. xx. 20—23, v. 23;) and received the crown of martyrdom, before any of the other apostles. As Herod found that the Jews were much pleased with this measure, he apprehended Peter also; (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, xxiv. 24—27. xxv. 9—11;) and probably he intended to put the other apostles to death, when he could get them into his power: but, as the passover and the feast of unleavened bread were then celebrated, he meant to defer his proceedings against Peter, till these solemnities were over. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Note, Matt. xxvi. 3—5.) He therefore committed him to sixteen soldiers, who were appointed to guard him in prison, night and day, four at a time by rotation; intending as soon as the feast was ended, to gratify the Jews by his publick execution. (Marg. Ref. h.)—Even if Easter were observed at that time, in the Christian church, of which nothing is mentioned in the sacred records; Herod would certainly pay no regard to it: it is therefore surprising, that the venerable translators of the Bible should have used that word, instead of "the passover," in this connexion!—This Herod ' was a great zealot for the Mosaic law, dwelt much at Jerusalem, and was fond of all opportunities of obliging the Jews. ... This early execution of one of the apostles, ... would illustrate the courage of the rest in going on with their ministry; as it would evidently shew, that all their miraculous powers did not secure them from dying by the sword of their enemies.' Doddridge.

V. 5—11. The time of Peter's imprisonment gave the church an opportunity, not of concerting measures for his rescue, but of pouring out their fervent prayers for the preservation of his useful life. Probably they met together in different places for that purpose; and one company succeeding to another, there was literally no intermission of their prayers for him, day or night. Yet he was free from anxiety about the event: and the night beshined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, ' Arise up quickly. ' And his chains fell off from his hands.

8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals: and so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.

9 And ' he went out, and followed him; ' and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel, but thought he saw a vision.

10 When they were past ^a the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city, ^x which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street, and forthwith the angel departed from him.

11 And when Peter ^y was come to himself, he said, Now ⁱ I know of a surety, ^a that the Lord hath sent his angel, ^b and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from ^c all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

12 And when he had considered the thing, ^d he came to the house of Mary, the mother of ^e John whose surname was Mark, ^f where many were gathered together, praying.

13 And as Peter ^g knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came to ^h hearken, named Rhoda.

14 And when she knew Peter's voice, ⁱ she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told how Peter stood before the gate.

15 And they said unto her, ^j Thou art mad. But she constantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, ^k It is his angel.

16 But Peter continued knocking: and when he had opened the door, and saw him, they were astonished.

17 But he, ^l beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, ^m declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, Go shew these things unto ⁿ James, and to the brethren. ^o And he departed, and went into another place.

fore his intended execution, while others were earnestly praying for his life, he went to sleep with the utmost composure; though his posture must have been very uneasy, being chained with two chains, one on each hand, to the two soldiers between whom he lay. Even the strong light, which attended the angel's entrance into the dungeon, did not awake Peter; but when the angel, gently smiting his side, caused him to arise, he found his chains immediately loosed. (Marg. Ref. k-p.) Yet, neither the voice of the angel, the light in the prison, the falling of the chains, nor the preparation of Peter to depart, was noticed by the keepers, who were supernaturally thrown into a deep sleep. Nay, Peter himself supposed, that he only saw a vision, as he had sometimes before done; and that it was not a reality. (Marg. Ref. q-t.—Note, x. 9-16.) The wards or watches here mentioned seem to have included the stated guard of the prison, as well as the soldiers especially appointed to keep Peter: and these too were rendered insensible to the whole transaction. "The great iron "gate" separated the environs of the prison from the city, and was doubtless barred in the strongest manner: yet it opened of its own accord. (Note, John xx. 19-23.) When the angel had led Peter out of the reach of his keepers, and into a part of the city which he knew; he departed from him, and then he became sensible of the reality of his deliverance. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Note, v. 17-25.)—The people, as Peter well knew, eagerly longed to see him put to death, as a special gratification; notwithstanding the numerous miracles of mercy, which had been performed by him! V. 12-17. This Mary was the sister of Barnabas. (Col. iv. 10.)—It is probable, that it had been customary, for some of the believers in Jerusalem to assemble at her house for religious worship; though it can scarcely be supposed that Peter knew that they were then joining in prayer for him. He, however, judged it best to go thither. But either their hopes were sunk very low, or they expected their prayers to be answered in some other way: for they were utterly indisposed to believe the report of the damsel, who informed them that he stood at the gate: and when she insisted upon it that it was Peter, for she knew his voice; rather than suppose, that he had actually obtained his liberty, they concluded, "that it was his "angel." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d-k.) They seem to have spoken according to the notion, true or false, which has generally prevailed; that when people are near death, or have actually expired, a spirit, or angel, in their exact form, and speaking with their voice, sometimes appears to their friends or acquaintance; which notion perhaps first arose from the opinion, that every man has his

18 Now as soon as it was day, there was no small stir among the soldiers, what was become of Peter.

19 And when Herod had sought for him, and found him not, he examined the keepers, and commanded that they should be put to death. And he went down from Judea to Cæsarea, and there abode.

20 ¶ And Herod was highly displeased with them of Tyre and Sidon: but they came with one accord to him; and, having made Blastus the 21 And upon a set day, Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them.

22 And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man.

23 And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory: and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost.

guardian angel appointed to take care of him. For to suppose, that they only meant that it was a messenger from him, is absurd; as a messenger could not speak with his well-known voice, though he might use his name.—When, however, Peter at length obtained admission, their transport of surprise was so great, that he could hardly obtain a hearing, when he desired to inform them, how the Lord had answered their prayers in his deliverance. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, Job ix. 14—21. Is. lxxv. 24, 25.) The other apostles seem to have been absent from Jerusalem: but James, the son of Alpheus, who wrote the epistle, was in some place of concealment in the neighbourhood; and Peter desired especially that he should be informed of his deliverance, for his encouragement. Having thus given proper directions to the disciples, he deemed it his duty to retire to some place of greater safety. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) —‘It is utterly incredible, that he now went to Rome, and made an abode of twenty-five years, which the popish writers pretend.’ Doddridge. It would be easy to multiply similar instances, in which the legends of the Romish church as much contradict the sacred history, as its traditions make void both the commandments and testimonies of God. V. 18, 19. The astonishment of the soldiers, when they found Peter was gone; their endeavours to throw the blame from themselves upon each other, and their dread of Herod's vindictive rage, may easily be conceived. Indeed they had cause to tremble: for that tyrant, exasperated at his disappointment, and unwilling it should be thought that Peter had been miraculously delivered, ordered them to immediate execution; alledging, no doubt, that Peter's escape was owing to their negligence and sleeping upon guard. (Marg. Ref. p—s.—Note, Matt. xxviii. 11—15.) Yet, it is highly probable, he himself perceived that Peter had been rescued in a supernatural manner, as all the apostles had before been; (Note, v. 17—25;) and we may suppose, that this intimidated him, and induced him to suspend the persecution. Perhaps the chagrin, at being thus baffled, might hasten his departure to Cæsarea, and influence him to continue there: though Josephus informs us, that he went thither to celebrate certain heathenish games, in honour of the Roman emperor.

That they should be put to death. (19) Απαχθῆναι. ‘Ad supplicium eos rapi jussit.’ Schleusner.—xxiv. 7. Matt. xxvii. 31. Luke xxiii. 6.

V. 20—23. The Tyrians and Zidonians, being engaged in extensive commerce, depended almost entirely on Judea and Galilee for corn and other provisions. (Notes, 1 Kings v. 2—9. Ez. xxvii. 13—25.) But Herod, having taken great offence at some part of their conduct, purposed to declare war against them; and by cutting off their supplies he could soon have reduced them to distress. This consideration led them to pay court to the king's favourite, by whose good offices they renewed their peace with him; having made the needful concessions and submissions. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) This gave occasion to Herod, on an appointed day, to display his magnificence in a most ostentatious manner, of which Josephus has given a particular account: and, having from his throne delivered a speech, with much affectation of eloquence, and boastings of his equity and clemency; the people, either impressed with the splendour of the scene, and by the graces of his elocution, or courting his favour by the most abominable flattery, exclaimed that “it was the voice of a God, and not of a man!” (Marg. Ref. z.) Many heathen princes had received, nay, arrogated to themselves, divine honours: but it was far more horrible impiety in Herod, who was acquainted with the word and worship of the living God, to accept, and be pleased with, such idolatrous and sacrilegious adorations, without rebuking the blasphemy, and giving God the glory. Immediately therefore an angel smote him with an incurable disease; so that his bowels bred worms, which consumed them: and, after lying for some time, a most abject and loathsome spectacle, in excruciating pain, he died in the most degraded and wretched manner that can be conceived. (Marg. Ref. a—e.) Josephus ascribes his miserable end to the judgment of God on him, for the impiety here recorded, and introduces him, as owning it in very strong language: but he suppresses some circumstances, probably from regard to his family; and it was reserved for an inspired writer to inform us, that his disease arose from a stroke inflicted by an angel. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. 2 Kings xix. 35—37.)—It is however remarkable, that the sacred historian does not represent the awful death of Herod, as a judgment on him for persecuting the church, though he had so inviting and so just an occasion of doing it; but assigns another cause of that event. This is a striking contrast to the usual practice of enthusiasts; who generally, without any adequate reason, take pleasure in representing all the calamities which befall those who even in a slight degree oppose them, as divine judgments on them for so doing.—Many persecutors have ended their days by a similar disease, which has rendered them more loathsome while alive, than a putrid corpse can be: as well as filled them with the most intolerable pains. (Notes, Zech. xiv. 12—15. Matt. ii. 19—23.)

V. 24. After the death of Herod, “the word of God” continued to grow and multiply; like seed, the produce of which is sown again the next year, and so on from year to year. (Notes, Is. lv. 10, 11. Matt. xiii. 18—23. 36—43. John xv. 12—16, v. 16.) Thus the believers, who sprang up from the first preaching of the word, still further diffused the knowledge of the gospel; and the cause of Christ got ground on every side, notwithstanding the opposition which was excited against it; and even by means of that opposition. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1—4.)

V. 25. (Note, xi. 27—30.) Probably Barnabas and Saul left Jerusalem, after a short continuance there, and perhaps before the beginning of this persecution: but the narrative, as it concerns them, is here resumed.—John Mark was nephew to Barnabas, and was taken by him and Saul, that he might be trained up for future usefulness; and, in the mean time, be serviceable to them in the multiplicity of their engagements. (Notes, xiii. 13—15. xv. 36—41. Preface to the Gospel according to Mark.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

The enmity of the human heart against God, and the instigations of Satan, concur in exciting opposition to the church from time to time: and when wicked rulers find, that the vexation and murder of pious Christians and zealous ministers are agreeable to their subjects, they are encouraged to proceed in that diabolical work. Thus, some of the saints, having finished their testimony, are removed to their rest: their pains are transient, and mitigated by divine consolations, and their subsequent felicity is unspeakable and eternal. (Notes, vii. 54—60. Is. lviii. 1, 2. Rev. xi. 7—12.) But amidst the “many devices, which

“are in the heart of man, the counsel of the LORD shall “stand.” (Notes, Ps. lxxvi. 10. Prov. xix. 21.)—When time is given for prayer, and great numbers are excited to join in it, as with one heart and soul; it may be regarded as an indication, that God intends to grant their desires. (Note, Jam. v. 16—18.) He is reluctant to refuse the petitions of his children; and therefore he sometimes suddenly executes his purposes, without giving them the opportunity of interposing their requests to the contrary. But the lives of eminent saints are more desired by their brethren, than by themselves. (Note, xx. 22—24.) A peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, produce the most entire composure in the immediate prospect of death, even in those very persons, who have at other times been the most distracted with terrors on that account. (Note, Matt. xxvi. 69—75.)—When the Lord sees good to deliver, all obstructions are insignificant: his angels gladly visit the dungeons or cells, where his poor and afflicted children lie: even they can defeat or suspend all the powers of men; and they delight to minister comfort to the heirs of salvation. (Notes, Luke xvi. 22, 23. Heb. i. 13, 14.)—Whether we be waiting for deliverance from the bondage of sin, or for the termination of our trials and sorrows, while the Lord affords us his light, and puts forth his power, to excite our attention and expectation; we should implicitly follow his directions, and wait his will. Thus will he lead us forth to liberty and safety, and deliver us from the power and expectation of our strongest enemies.—He sometimes answers prayer in so unexpected a manner, that his people can scarcely believe it a reality: nay, their fears and misapprehensions may for a time exclude the joy, to which he calls them; and even that joy, when excited, being accompanied with other tumultuous passions, may unfit them for the employment of the present moment; but the whole will surely terminate in adoring and rejoicing praises and thanksgivings.—It is our duty to take care of our lives, so long as the Lord sees good to preserve us; to shelter ourselves from the violence of furious enemies; and likewise to give encouragement from our experience, to those who are exposed to similar dangers; as well as to excite them to praise God in our behalf.

V. 18—25

The instruments of persecution are exposed to the most imminent danger: (Notes, Dan. iii. 19—23. vi. 24:) the wrath of God is suspended over all, who engage in this hateful work; and the tyranny of persecutors, when obstructed in its course, is apt to burst forth on every one who comes in its way, without regard to equity and mercy. But those who thus “fight against God,” ripen apace for more signal vengeance; while they are buoyed up, with success and flattery, into the most extravagant pride and arrogance.—We may, however, learn wisdom from the policy of the Tyrians and Zidonians: for we have justly offended the almighty Lord with our sins; we entirely depend on him for “life, and breath, and all things:” it

CHAP. XIII.

Barnabas and Saul, by the command of the Holy Spirit, are set apart from among other teachers at Antioch with fasting and prayer, and sent forth to preach the gospel, 1—3. Attended by John Mark, they arrive at Cyprus, and preach at Salamis, 4, 5. At Paphos, Elymas the sorcerer, opposing them, is smitten with blindness, and the deputy, Sergius Paulus, believes, 6—12. They pass through Pamphylia (where Mark leaves them) to Antioch in Pisidia, 13, 14. Saul, now named Paul, preaches in the synagogue, shewing that Jesus is the Messiah, through whom all believers are pardoned and justified; and warning his hearers not to reject him, 15—41. The Gentiles desire to hear the word again; and some Jews and proselytes join Paul and Barnabas, 42, 43. Almost the whole city throng to hear the word, 44. The envious Jews gainsay and blaspheme; and the apostles turn to the gentiles, of whom many believe, 45—49.

The Jews raise a persecution, and drive Paul and Barnabas away, who go to Iconium, 50, 51. The disciples are filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit, 52.

surely then behoves us to humble ourselves before him, that, through the appointed Mediator, who is ever ready to befriend us, we may be reconciled to him, before "wrath come upon us to the uttermost;" as it did upon proud Herod, who, while others trembled at his impotent rage, would not fear the almighty God! But, "a haughty spirit is before a fall:" "God resisteth the proud" as his rivals and enemies; angels gladly vindicate his glory, by crushing the sacrilegious competitors; the whole creation stands ready to avenge its Creator's cause upon those, who refuse to give him the glory; and the most contemptible insects or vermin are able to degrade, vilify, and torment those haughty rebels, who affect to be worshipped as deities. (Note, Ex. viii. 16, 17.) "The triumphing of the wicked is short:" the word of God, and the cause of the gospel, have stood their ground against many such boasting persecutors and opposers as Herod; their destruction has made way for its more abundant success; and the ruin of every one, who shall hereafter engage against the cause of Christ, will introduce its still further progress. (Notes, Rev. xix. 11—21.) But they, who labour to promote it, shall "go from strength to strength," and proceed from one service to another, till their work is finished: and then they shall enter into those glorious mansions, from which their eyes shall behold, and only behold, the destruction of the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The first considerable church of converts, consisting chiefly of the Gentiles, seems to have been collected at Antioch in Syria: so that it was the principal place of residence for those teachers, who went forth to preach among the Gentiles, even as Jerusalem was in respect of the Jewish converts. Several eminent persons were, at the time to which this chapter relates, resident there, (besides their stated pastors,) who were well qualified as teachers, and endowed with the gift of prophecy.—The surname of Niger, or "Black," by which Simeon was known, seems to have been given him on account of his complexion; perhaps he was a negro. Some have conjectured that this was Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear the cross after Jesus: and if so, Lucius was of the same country.—Manaen, who was educated along with Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, had probably renounced considerable prospects for the sake of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a—f.)—While these persons were employed in devotional exercises, in the intervals of their sacred ministry, and were observing a day of solemn fasting and prayer, probably in order to seek a blessing on their labours, and direction concerning their future progress; they were ordered, by an immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit, to "separate Barnabas and Saul for the work, unto which he had called them." (Marg. Ref. g—l.) This language evidently implies the personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit. (Note, x. 17—23. John xiv. 15—17. xvi. 7—13. 1 Cor. xii. 4—11.) The work intended was the preaching of the gospel to the gentiles at large, of which Saul had some previous information when he was converted. (Notes, xxii. 17—21. xxvi. 16—18.)—The prophets and teachers, in laying their hands on them, with fasting and prayer, acted by immediate order from the Holy Spirit; thus giving a public testimony to their assured confidence, that they were divinely appointed to that service, and expressing fervent desires for their success in it. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) Accordingly, they are said to have been "sent forth by the Holy Ghost." (4)—Barnabas and Saul had, for a considerable time, been ministers of the word: so that this imposition of hands could not be for the purpose of ordaining them; nor does it appear, that any spiritual gift, or new authority, was conferred by it. (Note, viii. 14—17.)—St. Paul was "an apostle, not by man:" (Note, Gal. i. 1, 2:) his apostolical office could not then be conferred at this time; but his appointment by the Lord Jesus himself, as the apostle of the gentiles, might thus be publicly acknowledged, in the principal church of gentile converts. Barnabas also is afterwards spoken of as an apostle. (xiv. 4, 14.) Perhaps he was appointed by the Holy Spirit to that office, on this occasion; with some reference to the martyrdom of James, by which the number of the apostles was diminished. (Note, xiv. 24—28.)

V. 4, 5. Selucia was a sea-port, about fifteen miles from Antioch. It does not appear that Saul and Barnabas preached there; but thence they passed into the island of Cyprus, the native place of Barnabas, (iv. 36,) and they had an opportunity of preaching in the synagogues at Salamis, the first city to which they came.—If the sentence of excommunication, which had been published against those who confessed Jesus to be the Christ, was still in force: (John xi. 57:) it is evident, that it was little noticed at a distance from Jerusalem: for the apostles were not refused admission into the synagogues, and were constantly allowed to preach in them. (Marg. Ref. p, q.)—John Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas, to perform such services by their direction, as he was capable of: with a view no doubt of his being employed more and more, as a preacher of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, 1 Kings xix. 19—21. 2 Kings iii. 11, 12.)

V. 6—12. The apostles went through the large and populous island of Cyprus, preaching in the cities as they had opportunity; doubtless with some success, both among the Jews and the Gentiles; till they arrived at Paphos, on the opposite side of it. This city was celebrated for the temple there dedicated to Venus, and infamous for the licentiousness practised at it. Here they met with a noted

sorcerer, or magician, named Bar-jesus, that is, “the son of Jesus.” This man, being a Jew, pretended to be a prophet, and, confirming his pretensions by magical arts, was endeavouring to gain the attention of the proconsul of Cyprus, or the Roman governor appointed by the senate. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) The proconsul, however, was an intelligent and considerate person, who desired to know the truth in these highly interesting concerns; and having heard of Saul and Barnabas, he invited them to come, and declare the word of God unto him. But Bar-jesus, (who was also called “Elymas,” from an Arabic word signifying a sorcerer,) foreseeing the ruin of his own character and influence, in case the proconsul should embrace the gospel; did all that he could to oppose the apostles, and to prejudice him against their doctrine. It may be supposed, that he disputed against the truth of the facts which they testified; misrepresented the nature and tendency of their doctrine; insinuated many things, in a subtle and malicious manner, against their intentions and to their disadvantage; and perhaps he performed some of his “lying miracles” to support his own pretensions against them. (Marg. Ref. z—b.) But Saul, under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, “set his eyes upon him,” as expressing his abhorrence of his crimes; declared him to be a man, “full of subtlety,” malignity, and mischief; “a child of the devil,” who bare his image and supported his cause; and “an enemy of all righteousness,” notwithstanding his plausible pretences: at the same time sharply expostulating with him, for thus pertinaciously misrepresenting and speaking evil of “the right ways of the Lord,” that he might countenance his own vile impostures. He then denounced sentence upon him, as in the name of God, that he should be struck blind; so that, “for a season,” he should be unable to see the light of the sun; though, in case he repented, the calamity might at length

13 ¶ Now when Paul and his company^q loosed from Paphos, they came to^r Perga in Pamphylia: and John departing from them returned to Jerusalem.

14 But when they departed from Perga, they came to^t Antioch in Pisidia, and^u went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day, and sat down.

15 And after^x the reading of the law and the prophets,^y the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying,^z Ye men and brethren,^a if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on.

be removed, as a similar one had been in the case of Saul himself. (Notes, ix. 8, 9. 17—22.) This sentence was immediately executed by the power of God: and, being enveloped in darkness, and filled with horror and confusion, he sought some person to lead him out of the place: an apt emblem of the benighted state of his soul. (Marg. Ref. d—m.) This decided victory of the apostles over their opponent, being connected with the other clear evidences of the truth of the gospel, and made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit, induced the proconsul to embrace and profess Christianity: for “he was astonished,” both at the energy of the doctrine upon his heart and conscience, and at the power of God by which it was confirmed. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—Some think that he was the first idolatrous Gentile, who was converted to Christ: but it is not probable, that all the gentile converts at Antioch had previously been proselyted from idolatry; or that Saul and Barnabas had made no converts from idolatry in their progress through Cyprus. The conversion, however, of so eminent a person was a very memorable event: probably he continued for some time in his high station, serving the Lord Jesus in the use of his authority, and countenancing the professors and preachers of the gospel by his influence and example.—Saul is here said to have been “also called Paul” (9); and henceforth he bears that name. As this is the same with the proconsul’s surname; some have thought that he assumed it on account of the conversion of this ruler: but it is more probable, that before this the Greeks had called him Paul, and the Hebrews Saul; and that, from this time, being generally conversant with the Gentiles, he was commonly known by the former name.—Dr. Lardner has, with great learning, vindicated the accuracy of St. Luke, in calling the governor a proconsul; and shewn, that those who governed the provinces by the appointment of the senate, were called proconsuls, though they had never been consuls; and that Cyprus was at this time a province of that description.

V. 13—15. It does not appear, whether Paul and Barnabas had or had not any opportunity of preaching the gospel at Perga, or in Pamphylia: but John Mark by this time grew weary of the fatigue and hardship of the journey; and, foreseeing that they should meet with many perils and persecutions in their future progress, he consulted too much his own ease and inclinations; and so leaving them he returned to Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, Matt. viii. 21, 22. Luke ix. 57—62. Phil. ii. 19—23.) This indicated an inconstancy of mind, unbecoming one, who was engaged in so important a service; and the consequences resulting from this conduct are repeatedly mentioned, in the subsequent part of the sacred volume. (Notes, 4, 5. xv. 36—41. Col. iv. 9—14, v. 10. 2 Tim. iv. 9—13, v. 11.)—Paul and Barnabas, however, proceeded to Antioch in Pisidia, a province of Asia Minor, which was at a great distance from Antioch in Syria, whence they set out. There they went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day: and after the sections, from the law of Moses and from the writings of the prophets, had been read, the rulers of the synagogue invited them to speak to the congregation. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Note, xv. 21. Luke iv. 16—19.) Either they had previously heard of them, or from them; or something in their conduct indicated their desire to be heard.—The apostles frequented the synagogues on the sabbath-days, in order to find an opportunity to preach: but the disciples in general observed the first day of the week, for their assembling together. (Note, xx. 7—12, v. 7.) Yet the Jewish converts seem also to have kept the sabbath for some time: and this change, as well as some others, appears to have been brought about gradually, to avoid giving needless offence to the Jews.—If ye have any, &c. (15) Literally, “If any word of exhortation be in you.” “There is some emphasis in this Hebraism; by which it is understood, that whatever there is in us of divine grace, is derived to us from God, that we may carry it about as a treasure shut up in earthen vessels.” Beza. main subject by such a reference to the history of Israel, as was suited to conciliate their minds and to fix their attention. (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Note, vii. 1—8.)—Some explain the expression, “Ye that fear God,” of the religious proselytes (43): but it is plain, that there were Gentiles, as well as proselytes, in the synagogue (42); perhaps some place was allotted to them, in hopes that they would soon embrace the Jewish religion, as others already had done.—The apostle reminded them, that the God of Israel had of old chosen their fathers; and likewise had formerly raised their nation from a state of deep depression in Egypt, to great honour and prosperity in Canaan. He had with mighty power delivered them from bondage, graciously borne with their provocations, for forty years in the wilderness, destroyed the Canaanites, and then divided the land by lot among them.—These events were both an accomplishment of the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in whose “Seed all the nations of the earth would be blessed,” and a type of a better and more spiritual redemption. V. 20. This verse has peculiar difficulties connected with it. The time, which elapsed from the departure of Israel out of Egypt, to the building of Solomon's temple, was no more than four hundred and eighty years. (Note, 1 Kings vi. 1.) But, on the lowest computation, fifty-seven years elapsed, from the passage of the Red Sea to the death of Joshua; and eighty-four years, during the days of Sanuel, Saul, and David, and till the fourth year of Solomon: and this leaves only three hundred and thirty-nine years, from the death of Joshua to the times of Samuel. So that, without adverting to the difficulties of computing the years during the judges; (Notes, Judg. iii. 11. xi. 25, 26;) it is evident that this general calculation cannot possibly allow four hundred and fifty years for that part of the history, even continuing it to twenty years after the death of Eli. Some alteration, therefore, seems unavoidably needful either in this narrative, or in the general statement in Kings. On this ground some think that three hundred and fifty years, should be read, in this place, instead of four hundred and fifty: and it is evident, that the error might easily be made by a transcriber. This would bring the computation within about ten or eleven years: and, as the historian says, “about the space, &c.” it might be improper to expect greater accuracy. There is, however, no authority, which warrants such a change in the text.—Josephus saith, that Solomon began to build the temple... five hundred and ninety-two years after the children of Israel's departure out of Egypt. Now if you make the time of the Judges four hundred and fifty years, the computation is exactly five hundred and ninety-one years. He' (Paul) therefore here, ... accords with the computation of his nation, at that time, that so they might not except against his words. Wilderness 40, Joshua 17, Judges 450, Samuel and Saul 40, David 40, Solomon 4:—591. ... St. Luke continually follows exactly the computation of the Septuagint and of the Jews, as we learn from his inserting Cainan; (Luke iii. 36;) his making Saul to reign forty years (21); and from this verse, where he accords exactly with Josephus. Whitby.—Perhaps this learned writer did not recollect, that this computation of Josephus alters the whole system of biblical chronology. For the chronology of the Hebrew scripture to the Exodus, and from the building of the temple till the coming of Christ, is founded on grounds sufficiently firm: but if one hundred and twelve years, more than the general computation, passed between the Exodus and the building of the temple; then the birth of Christ took place, in the year of the world 4115, instead of 4004. It is well known, or at least generally acknowledged, that the chronology, both of the Septuagint and of Josephus, is erroneous and perplexed, in no ordinary degree: but how far the apostle, and Luke in recording his discourse, took these unimportant matters, as they found them, is another question: and if they did so, the circumstance of learned men in their studies having discovered that those generally admitted calculations were inaccurate, has, in my view, nothing to do with the divine inspiration, of either the preacher or the historian. For they were inspired, to deliver divine truth to mankind, unsophisticated and unmutilated: not to correct genealogies, or give chronological calculations. Even, on the supposition, that the apostle was aware of the inaccuracy; it would have obstructed his grand object, to advance any new opinion, or to go out of his way to correct the current one.—Grotius and Usher note here, that other copies read thus; “He divided to them their land about four hundred and fifty years, and after that he gave them judges:” and they begin the time of this computation from the birth of Isaac, ... and to the end of seven years, (in Canaan,) when the land was divided to them, was about four hundred and fifty years. Whitby. I agree with this writer, that this is not the natural or obvious construction of the passage: but could it stand without any alteration of the text, it might be admitted.—“And after these things which took up about four hundred and fifty years, he gave them judges, &c.” This would require no change in the text: but I doubt whether it be not wholly inadmissible; and if so, we must recur to the solution above given.

V. 21. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. viii—xii.) ‘David was but thirty years of age, when he began to reign over Judah, which was not till after Saul was slain: (2 Sam. v. 4:) and Samuel did not only anoint him, (at which time we cannot suppose David to have been less than fifteen years old,) but lived a considerable time after. ...The authority of Josephus is urged: ... for he says, ... that Saul reigned eighteen years during Samuel's life, ... and twenty-two after his death: ... but this is utterly incredible; for then David could not be eight years old when Samuel anointed him.’ Doddridge.—Indeed, as many subsequent events, which must have occupied several years, took place, between the anointing of David and the death of Samuel; (Notes, 1 Sam. xvi—xxv. 1;) it is certain, according to the scriptural history, that Saul survived Samuel but a short time; and every circumstance combines to prove, that all the years during which Samuel judged Israel, and Saul reigned, are here intended ‘I suppose, that the years of Samuel also are ‘added to the reign of the king, by Paul:’ Sulpitius Severus: ‘as doubtless they were, they making together ‘just forty years.’ Whitby.

V. 23. The mention of David gave the apostle an occasion of introducing his grand subject: for the Messiah was foretold, as “the son of David;” and Paul was prepared to prove, that Jesus was the Messiah, “the Son of David.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ii. 25—32. 2 Sam. vii. 12—17. Ps. cxxxii. 17. Is. vii. 13, 14. ix. 6, 7. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Matt. i. 20, 21. xxi. 8—11. xxii. 41—46. Luke i. 26—33. ii. 8—14.)

V. 24—37. ‘He indicates that John was the herald of Christ, who did not foretel his coming as a distant event; but pointed him out as already come.’ Beza. (Note, Matt. xi. 13—15.)—The Jews, who were present, had doubtless heard of John's ministry; and of his declaration that he was not the Messiah, but his fore-runner; and probably to return to corruption, he said on this wise, ^x I will give you ^y the sure mercies of David.

35 Wherefore he saith also ^z in another psalm, Thou shalt not suffer thine holy One ^a to see corruption.

36 For David, after he had [†] served his own generation by the will of God, ^b fell on sleep, ^c and was laid unto his fathers, ^d and saw corruption :

37 But ^e he whom God raised again saw no corruption.

38 Be ^f it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, ^g that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins.

some report had reached them of his testimony to Jesus. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Matt. iii. 1—12. John i. 6—9. 19—42. iii. 27—36.) The apostle therefore referred them to that testimony, while he pressed them all, both the descendants of Abraham, and all others who worshipped God, to believe and embrace “the word of salvation” which had been sent to them. He then obviated the prejudice, which would arise in their minds against his doctrine, from the conduct of the rulers at Jerusalem: observing, that they indeed had not known their Messiah, when he appeared in the midst of them: (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, John xvi. 1—3. 1 Cor. i. 6—9:) nor had they understood the scriptures, which were publicly and constantly read among them. (Note, 13—15.)—Thus they had ignorantly fulfilled them, by judging and condemning Jesus, and procuring his crucifixion from Pilate; though they could allege no crime against him, except that he declared himself to be “the Son of God.” And when they had, without designing it, fulfilled the various predictions of the prophets, concerning his sufferings and death; they allowed him to be taken down from the cross and buried, and then guarded the sepulchre with all care to prevent any imposition. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Notes, ii. 22—24. Matt. xxvii. 57—66.) But “God had raised him from “the dead;” which was testified by a great number of most unexceptionable witnesses. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Note, John xx. 24—29.) Accordingly, they (even Paul and Barnabas) had travelled as far as Antioch to declare to their brethren “the glad tidings,” that God had fulfilled in their days the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David, in raising from the dead the Lord Jesus, and thus attesting him to be his only begotten Son, according to the prophecy of the Messiah contained in the second Psalm. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Note, Ps. ii. 7—9.) The passage here quoted shews that the Messiah was “the “Son of God,” in a peculiar sense; and the decree there mentioned was confirmed, when he was “declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead.” (Note, Rom. i. 1—4.)—In respect of that event, it might be inferred from the words of the Lord by his prophet, declaring that he would give to believers “the sure “mercies of David.” (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Is. lv. 1—3.) These “sure mercies” especially referred to the promised Messiah, and his kingdom and salvation: but the prophet predicted also the sufferings and death of the Messiah in the strongest terms; (Notes, Ps. xxii. lxix. Is. liii. Dan. ix. 24—27. Zech. xiii. 7;) so that these “sure mercies” could not be conferred, but through his resurrection and exaltation. Accordingly David had prophesied in another Psalm, that “God would not “suffer his holy One to see corruption.” (Notes, ii. 25—32. Ps. xvi. 8—11.) This could not be understood of David himself: for, having served the interests of Israel, during that generation in which he lived, “according to “the will of God, he fell on sleep;” and, being laid to his fathers, “he saw,” or turned to, “corruption.” But Jesus, his Descendant and Antitype, having arisen on the third day, “saw no corruption;” nor was he again to die and return to the grave, the scene of corruption; but to live for ever in heavenly glory: and it does not appear, that any other person, since the world began, actually died, and yet did not eventually see corruption. Enoch and Elijah were “translated that they should not see “death.” Those whom the prophets, and Jesus, and the apostles, raised, afterwards died and returned to dust; and those who rose after Christ’s resurrection, it is probable, had “seen corruption.” Every part therefore of the doctrine accorded to the predictions of the prophets; which concurred with the testimony of the apostles to the resurrection of Jesus, and with the miracles wrought by him and them, to demonstrate that he was the promised Messiah. The several quotations are nearly in the words of the Septuagint, which accord with the Hebrew.—The second Psalm. (33) The Psalms were arranged in the same order as they are at present.

As there is no preposition to either clause, the words may be rendered “Having served,” or “ministered unto the will,” or counsel, “of God, in his “own generation, he fell asleep, &c” And this seems the more exact view of the subject. “The counsel of “God,” to which David ministered, related to many generations: but he fulfilled his service during his life: whereas Christ fulfils a most important part of his office, subsequent to his death as risen and ascended and glorified.

V. 38—41. The apostle here applied the doctrine, which he had stated and proved. It was of the utmost importance to the people, to be assuredly convinced, that through this person, even Jesus the incarnate Son of God, forgiveness of sins was preached to them, by his atoning sacrifice, and as the gift of his mercy; and that none could possibly obtain that benefit, save by faith in him.

40^k Beware therefore lest that come upon you^l which is spoken of in the prophets;

42 ¶ And when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, ^o the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached to them ^p the next sabbath.

43 Now when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews ^q and religious proselytes ^r followed Paul and Barnabas: who, speaking to them, ^s persuaded them to continue in ^t the grace of God.

44 And the next sabbath-day ^u came

(Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, ii. 37—40. Luke xxiv. 44—49, iv. 46, 47.) But all that believed would be completely justified from every charge, brought against them on account of their sins; and in such a manner, as could not be done according to the Mosaic law. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) There were several crimes, for which no sacrifices were appointed, but to which the sentence of death was annexed, by that law: (Note, Ps. li. 16:) nor could the legal sacrifices take away guilt from the conscience; except as the penitent offender, through them, had a believing dependence on the promised Redeemer and his atoning sacrifice. (Notes, Heb. ix. 8—28. x. 1—18.) That whole dispensation also was now virtually abolished; having lost all its efficacy; and could not profit those who rejected the salvation of Jesus. (Note, Heb. x. 26, 27.)—It therefore behoved them to beware, lest the awful denunciations of the prophets, against the despisers of the mercy and justice of God, should come upon them.—“The work” here spoken of, may be that of redemption by the blood of Christ; or rather, that of approaching vengeance on the Jews for their contempt of him, and the admission of the Gentiles to their forfeited privileges. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, ii. 14—21. vi. 9—14.) All these were fully testified, authenticated, or predicted; but the scornful men of that age and nation would not believe them, and therefore they would be filled with astonishment, and so perish. (Notes, Is. xxviii. 12—22. Hab. i. 5.)—The prophecies referred to seem primarily to have related to the Babylonish captivity; but they were still more awfully accomplished in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the rejection of the almost the whole city together, to hear ^v the word of God.

45 But when the Jews saw the multitudes, ^w they were filled with envy, and ^x spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting ^y and blaspheming.

46 Then Paul and Barnabas ^z waxed ^{aa} bold, and said, ^{ab} It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but ^{ac} seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we ^{ad} turn to the Gentiles:

47 For ^{ae} so hath the Lord commanded us, ^{af} saying, ^{ag} I have set thee to be a Light of the Gentiles, ^{ah} that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.

Jews, with tremendous judgments, for their opposition to the gospel. (Marg. Ref. m, n.)—This discourse, and the subsequent verses, are worthy of particular consideration; especially for the representation which it gives of the apostle's message; and as it enters so explicitly, in the way of the epistles, into the doctrine of justification by Christ. (Notes, Rom. iii. 19—26. iv. 1—8. v. 1, 2.)—The gospel which the apostle brought, was the fulfilment of the great promise made to the fathers. (23. 29. 32.) It was the word of God. (44. 46.) It related to a Saviour and salvation, “the word of this salvation.” (23. 26. 47.) Repentance was the great preparation (24); the forgiveness of sins and full justification its primary blessings; (38, 39;) and its great scope, its ultimate blessing, “everlasting life;” (46. 48;) and these blessings were restricted to believers in Jesus, and extended to all of them without exception.—Behold, &c. (41) From the LXX, with some variation: but it varies more from the Hebrew. (Hab. i. 5.)

sabbath-day. Some render the words, “in the intervening week;” (Marg.) but the concourse of people on the ensuing sabbath establishes the sense of our translation; though it is probable, that the private labours of Paul and Barnabas, during the week, concurred in bringing together so great a multitude on the next sabbath-day. Several Jews and religious proselytes, however, followed Paul and Barnabas, professing faith in Jesus; whom they exhorted and persuaded to continue in attendance on the gospel, and in dependence on the mercy and grace of God revealed in it; and not to suffer themselves to be discouraged or perverted by any of the reasonings, revilings, or persecutions, which were used to turn them aside from the truth. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, xi. 23, 24. xiv. 21—23.) On the ensuing sabbath, almost all the inhabitants of the city, idolaters as well as others, were drawn together, by various motives, to hear what the apostles had to communicate. This, instead of rejoicing the Jews, filled them with envy and indignation; because the blessings of the Messiah’s kingdom, and the peculiar privileges belonging to the people of God, were thus set before the Gentiles, and enquired after by them: and their prejudices against the gospel being thus increased; they set themselves to contradict the testimony and doctrine of the apostles, reviling them as impostors; and, it is probable, blaspheming the Lord Jesus, and his miracles and authority. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) When therefore Paul and Barnabas saw the inveteracy of their malice, they took courage to testify against them; observing, that it was indeed necessary, according to the promises of the scripture, and the express command of Christ, that the gospel should first be proposed to them; (Note, Luke xxiv. 44—49, vv. 47, 48:) but since they decidedly rejected it, and were condemned out of their own mouths, as unworthy of eternal life, and improper persons to receive so infinitely valuable a gift; (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, Prov. viii. 35, 36. Ez. xviii. 30—32, v. 32;) those who were sent to preach it would unreservedly make the same proposal to the Gentiles, and associate with them. For this, they had not only the command of the Lord Jesus, but the authority of their scriptures; which had declared that the Messiah was to be set for “the Light of the Gentiles, and “for salvation to the ends of the earth.” (Marg. Ref. b—c.—Note, Is. xlix. 5, 6.)—This declaration rejoiced the Gentiles, who honoured and respected the word of God, while the Jews opposed and perverted it: and though it is not probable that all, who were thus affected at first, did at that time “believe unto salvation;” yet many did, even “as many as were ordained to eternal life.” (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—Some interpret the word here used, of the internal disposition of the heart of the hearers: those who were in earnest to obtain eternal life at all adventures, believed the gospel. This indeed does not seem the meaning of the word; yet as such a disposition is the effect of pre-

The justice of this remark may fairly be disputed: but it shews at least, what even an opponent allows to have been the creed of the translators; for men do not generally, in translating or commenting, give words a meaning contrary to their own decided opinions, without very strong reasons for so doing.—It is indeed useless, and highly improper, and quite unnecessary, to rest the argument on a word, which may perhaps admit of some other meaning: but the laboured discussions of those, who are greatly afraid lest the doctrine of gratuitous personal election to eternal life should be collected from it, leave this impression on my mind, that these writers would themselves have carefully avoided a term, which needs so much guarding against misconstruction.—I have set, &c. V. 49—52. The indefatigable and successful labours of the apostles, exasperated more and more the unbelieving Jews: and they, being themselves destitute of authority, excited some women of rank, who had embraced and were peculiarly zealous for the Jewish religion; and by their means the magistrates were stirred up against the apostles: so that an edict was obtained, banishing them from the city and its adjacent territory, as disturbers of the publick peace. They, therefore, having solemnly warned their persecutors, in the way which Jesus had commanded, that they were thus exposing themselves to the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The Lord raises up instruments for his work, and brings them forth from various places and situations in life : and that zeal for his glory, with which he inspires their hearts, induces them to renounce the most pleasing connexions, and flattering prospects, that they may be employed in promoting his cause.—Whatever means are used, or rules observed, for ordaining ministers ; the Holy Spirit alone can fit them for their important work, and call them forth to it : but “fasting and prayer” are highly proper attendants on their separation to that sacred service.—Those who ‘are moved by the Holy Ghost to take this office upon them,’ and “are sent forth by him,” will find opportunities of exercising their ministry. The ignorance, carelessness, and profligacy of numbers will indeed obstruct their usefulness : yet false teachers, and vain pretenders to religion, are the most pernicious opposers of the gospel : for they prejudice the minds of enquirers by their misconduct ; or induce them, through misrepresentations and perversions, to embrace some vain delusion, instead of “the truth as it is in Jesus.” “Prudent men,” however, who know the value of their souls, and the importance of eternal things, will desire to hear the word of God, and to give it a fair and careful investigation, whatever be their rank in life.—It does not behove us, who have no miraculous powers, or infallible guidance of the Holy Spirit, to use such decided language, in reproofing opposers and deceivers, as Paul did to “Elymas the sorcerer :” yet we may plainly expose the hypocrisy, dissimulation, malice, and enmity, of those children and servants of “the wicked one,” who shew themselves to be “enemies to all righteousness,” by deliberately “perverting the right ways of the Lord,” and the evident truths of the gospel, to promote their own credit and interest. Assuredly “their end will be according to their works :” their wilful blindness will expose them to judicial blindness, and this will terminate “in the blackness of dark-

Paul is stoned, at the instigation of the Jews from Antioch and Iconium, and left for dead ; but reviving, he goes with Barnabas to Derbe, 19, 20. They return to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, confirming the churches, and ordaining elders in each of them, 12—23. Passing through Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Perga, they sail to Antioch in Syria, and rehearse to the church what things God had wrought by them, 24—28.

“ness for ever ;” unless they repent during the season of the Lord’s long-suffering towards them : and the truth of God will be established and made successful, by the ruin and confusion of all its opposers.

V. 13—22.

Those “who put their hands to the plow, and look back, “are not fit for the kingdom of God.” If we are not prepared to face opposition, and to endure hardship, we are not properly qualified for the work of the ministry. Yet some, who at first disappointed the expectation of senior ministers, have afterwards been recovered and made useful.—The reading of the scriptures, in the publick assemblies of God’s people, is an ancient and excellent usage ; and they, who are called to preach the gospel, will find a peculiar advantage, in laying their credentials and instructions in this manner before the people. Yet alas ! many both read and hear the word of God, who do not understand or believe it ; and the scriptures are, alas, very often so read in our churches, that it might be supposed, the readers did not desire to be heard and understood by the congregation !—The gospel should be “preached to every creature :” yet with an especial address to those “who fear God,” and enquire after the way in which his favour may be obtained. On some occasions, it is advisable to put the case most favourably, in respect of the dispositions and profession of our hearers ; that we may thence take occasion to reason with them from their own principles, and to exhort them to behave consistently with their characters.—Every transient view of the dealings of God with his church reminds us of his mercy and long-suffering, and of man’s ingratitude and perverseness : but when he grants our inordinate desires, we may expect a scourge instead of a comfort. He will however remove those who rebel against him ; that he may raise up others in his church, who may act more “according to his own heart, to fulfil all his will.” May this be done, both in respect of rulers and ministers of religion, all over the earth, and that speedily. Amen.

V. 23—37.

The most honoured servants of God have discovered or been conscious of great imperfection ; and have confessed themselves unworthy to perform the meanest service to the divine Saviour. They call men to repentance, and direct their attention to Jesus : yet they soon fulfil their course, and are gathered to their fathers ; but “he ever liveth to save to the uttermost all them, who come to God through him.” (Note, Heb. vii. 23—25.) Still this “word of salvation is sent to us ;” and every one who truly fears God will accept of it. But too many fulfil the scriptures, by opposing the truth, through ignorance and unbelief ;

after the example of those who “ crucified the Lord of glory.” May we then look to him, as “ declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead,” “ now no more to return to corruption,” as testified to by prophets and apostles, and as the substance and repository of “ the sure mercies of David;” that, by faith in him, we may walk with God, and “ serve our generation according to his will;” and when death comes, may fall asleep in him, with a joyful hope of a blessed resurrection.

V. 38—52.

Forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ, and him alone, should be preached to all men; for this is the most needful blessing for every sinner, and an introduction to all others; “ and by him all that believe are justified from all their sins,” be they ever so numerous and aggravated; a privilege which no law or institution besides could ever confer. (Notes, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2. Rom. iv. 6—8. P. O. 1—8. Note, v. 1—5.) But woe to those despisers, who will not believe the testimony of God, either concerning the redemption which he has wrought, or concerning the judgment which he has appointed; but treat the declaration of them with self-righteous, worldly, or infidel contempt, or with careless indifference! With what astonishment will they at length hear the despised Jesus denounce on them the sentence of everlasting condemnation! But, while immense numbers thus “ judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life;” others, and those often the most unlikely persons, desire to hear more of the glad tidings of salvation: thus the prodigal “ comes to himself;” returns home, and is welcomed and feasted; whilst the elder brother is filled with indignation and envy, and begins to oppose, contradict, and blaspheme. (Notes, Matt. xxi. 28—32. Luke xv. 20—32. P. O. 17—32.) We must not, however, be satisfied with hopeful appearances: but exhort such as are thus seriously impressed, to “ continue in the grace of God,” and instruct them in what manner to resist the temptations, to which they will be exposed. (Notes, John viii. 30—36. xv. 3—11.)—As many as are “ ordained to eternal life” will believe: but we know not previously who these are: we should therefore declare, that “ Jesus is placed for a Light of the Gentiles, and for Salvation to the ends of the earth:” and we should publish his truth as extensively as we can; and bear our testimony against those who oppose and reject it, however honourable or devout they may appear.

Thus the word of God will be glorified in the midst of persecution: and Jesus will fill his disciples with grace, peace, and “ joy in the Holy Ghost,” to support them under tribulations, and to render them triumphant over all the power and subtlety of the enemy of their souls.

V. 3, 4. The apostles judged it necessary to continue at Ieonium for a considerable time, notwithstanding the persecution which was gathering against them; and boldly to fulfil their ministry in dependence on the Lord; in order to encourage and establish the new converts, that opposition and danger might not subvert them: and God was pleased at this time “ to give testimony to the word of his grace,” to enable them to work many miracles, which perhaps they had not done at Antioch. (Note, iv. 29—31.) Thus a considerable part of the inhabitants either embraced the gospel, or favoured the cause: and these counteracting the machinations of their opponents, the apostles were for a time protected. (Marg. Ref.)—“ Our constancy ought to equal the obstinate perverseness of the wicked. ... We should not give place, because of threatenings, no, nor even of open violence, except there be an evident necessity; and then, not for the sake of enjoying quiet, but that the gospel may be more extensively propagated.” Beza. violently to apprehend Paul and Barnabas; and, having disgraced and insulted them, as disturbers of the city, to stone them as blasphemers. But this conspracy was discovered by some at the very crisis of danger: and thus the apostles escaped, and went first to Lystra, and afterwards to Derbe (20), where, not at all discouraged by perils or ill usage, they boldly "preached the gospel." (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Thes. ii. 1—8.)—The situation of these cities may be far better understood by a good map, than by any description in words.

It is probable, that by a divine suggestion St. Paul knew, that the man expected a cure from the power of the Lord Jesus, and that it was a proper occasion for him to perform a miracle. He therefore called to him with a loud voice, to stand upright on his feet; and he was enabled at once to use his limbs with as entire ease, agility, and vigour, as though he had never been lame. V. 11—18. When the idolaters saw this astonishing effect follow upon the speaking of a few words by Paul; they concluded, according to the fabulous traditions of their priests and poets, that two of their deities had become visible in human form. The age and gravity of Barnabas suggested to them the opinion, that he was Jupiter, their supreme deity; and Paul's promptitude in speaking; joined perhaps to his personal appearance, led them to suppose that he was Mercury, the patron of eloquence; and as they imagined the interpreter of the gods. And so firmly were they persuaded of these things, that the priest of Jupiter, of whom there was a temple, or statue; near the gates of the city, was induced to bring bulls and garlands, either to decorate the sacrifices, or the intended objects of their worship; and they were about immediately to seek the favour of the apostles, by divine honours and a propitiatory offering! But Paul and Barnabas discovering their intention, were more discomposed by it, than by all the persecution which they had experienced; and to express their detestation of their idolatry, and especially that themselves were become the objects of it, they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, expostulating with them about their conduct, protesting against the sacrilegious honours intended them; declaring that they were mere men like themselves, liable to the same infirmities, sufferings, and death; and reminding them that they came to preach to them, that they should relinquish "these vanities" and delusions, and worship the great Creator of the universe. (Marg. Ref. f—o.) This was very bold and decided language to zealous idolaters, with their priests at the head of them, in such a critical juncture; and may be very properly contrasted with the temporizing conduct of heathen philosophers, who, being convinced of the folly and falsehood of the vulgar superstitions, not only conformed to them, but instructed their disciples to do the same, as a part of their duty to the republick. Thus they made hypoerisy, and dissimulation in so important a matter, an essential part of their instructions, confirmed it by their example, and perpetuated as much as they could, the most stupid idolatry, connected with the most abominable vices; from generation to generation!—Let the intelligent reader compare this conduct and declaration of the apostles towards the worshippers of Jupiter, with some modern admired effusions of expanded candour, in which the worship of God, whether men call him JEHOVAH, Jove, Lord, or by any other name, is supposed to be equally acceptable to him. Is it then of no consequence whether JEHOVAH, or Jupiter, or Baal be God? Surely either the prophets and apostles were bigots, or these men have renounced Christianity. (Note, 1 Kings xviii. 21. P. O. 17—29.)—Paul and Barnabas further added, that God had, in his unsearchable wisdom, justice, and long-suffering, hitherto suffered all nations to walk in their own ways; and therefore idolatry had generally prevailed. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, xvii. 22—31. Rom. i. 18—27.) Yet the idolaters were without excuse, as God had “not left himself without witness:” seeing he still had done them good in his providence; and afforded them many temporal benefits, which both satisfied their bodily necessities, and conduced to the joy, and gladness of their hearts. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, Jer. xiv. 19—22. Matt. v. 43—48.) By these discourses, they with difficulty restrained the people from proceeding with their sacrifice: yet it seems that they were by no means disposed to hear their doctrine at this time; but rather were displeased with their refusal of the honours intended them. (Notes, Matt. xxi. 8—11. xxvii. 19—23.)—“As a friend, in sending us frequent presents, expresses his remembrance of us and affection to us, though he neither speaks nor writes, so all the gifts of the divine bounty, which are scattered abroad on every side, are so many witnesses sent to attest the divine care and goodness.” Doddridge.—“Here see,” saith Chrysostom, “the devil’s malice! He would have brought in ... divine worship of men, by those very persons who were sent to convert men from it! persuading them again to esteem men as gods, as formerly they had done! And how fully he hath done this in the Roman church, where innumerable men are worshipped with invocation, and even mental prayers, which suppose them to know the hearts of the supplicants, and so to have the property, ascribed to God alone in the scriptures, I have fully shewed.” ... Cicero ... proves, the gods must be of human shape, because they never appeared in any other! Whilby.—Like passions. (15) “The pagans never denied, that their gods were beings of like passions with themselves; but they attributed to them a total exemption from mortality and disease. ... Indeed this was not only the principal, but, I may almost say, the sole distinction they made between gods and men. ... We are your fellow mortals, as liable as you to disease and death.” Campbell. This appears the direct import of the apostle’s words; yet liability to other infirmities and passions of human nature, needs not to be excluded: but certainly they pervert the expression, who explain it of the prevalence of sinful passions. (Note, Jam. v. 16—18.)

V. 19, 20. The apostles still continued at Lystra, in order to improve the advantage, which the miracle they had wrought seemed to promise them. But when the Jews of Antioch and Iconium heard of their success and reputation, they followed them to Lystra, and by their insinuations induced the people to treat them as impostors, and disturbers of the peace. Accordingly they first assaulted Paul, whose activity rendered him peculiarly obnoxious both to the Jews and the idolaters; and, stoning him till they supposed he had been dead, dragged him out of the city with the utmost indignity. Thus he who had concurred, with full approbation in stoning Stephen, was reminded of that great sin, by enduring the tortures of being stoned. But though he was bereft of sense and motion for a time, yet his life was in him: and whilst the disciples stood around him, probably intending to bury him, (Note, viii. 2.) it pleased God to restore him miraculously to his strength, and to heal his bruises; so that he was able to travel the next day with Barnabas to Derbe. It is indeed intimated, that he was not dead: yet without a miracle, he could not, after being stoned and left for dead, have been able to travel, probably on foot, the very next day. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ix. 36—43. xx. 7—12. 2 Cor. xi. 24—27. 2 Tim. iii. 10—12.)

V. 21—23. After the apostles had published the glad tidings of salvation, and “made many disciples” in Derbe, they revisited the several cities, whence they had been driven by persecution; to instruct, encourage, and establish the new converts: "exhorting them to continue in "the faith;" and shewing them, that the kingdom of God and his heavenly felicity, must be entered, through many afflictions, trials, and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Notes, xi. 23, 24. xiii. 42—48. 1 Thes. iii. 1—5.) They also appointed elders over them in every church. These elders were their stated pastors, who presided in the worship of God, and preached his word to them. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) In respect of the manner in which these elders were selected, it cannot be supposed, that the apostles, in their present circumstances, would appoint any to the sacred ministry, who were not acceptable to the people; or that they would ordain any, without their own full satisfaction that they were proper persons, whatever the people might be inclined to. There seems to have been the most perfect harmony in the management of this important concern: yet it can scarcely be doubted, that both the apostles, and those to whom, in some sense, they afterwards delegated this part of their authority, interfered with their judgment and influence, in the nomination of proper persons to the ministerial office; as well as set them apart by imposition of hands and prayer. In all such questions, the middle, between the extreme points contended for by the zealots of opposite parties, seems to be the nearest to the true state of the case.—As the churches increased, deacons were doubtless chosen, under the superintendence of the elders: but it does not appear that the apostles appointed any at this time.—After this was settled, the apostles, by prayer and fasting, commended the new converts to the gracious keeping of the Lord Jesus, in whom they had believed. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) It is probable, that the apostles, and those employed by them, selected the presbyters, or pastors, from such as were more signally made partakers of miraculous gifts, by the Holy Spirit; yet, as these endowments might be possessed by those who had not true faith and grace; and, as eminent and intelligent believers do not seem always to have been endowed with them; it appears unscriptural to suppose that all such were appointed to the pastoral office, and none else.—No impartial person can (as it appears to me,) read this passage, without being convinced, that stated resident pastors of each church, and not preachers

V. 24—28. After some other labours in the regions of Asia Minor, the apostles returned to Antioch in Syria; (Marg. Ref. p, q;) whence they had been recommended, by the prayers of their brethren, "to the grace of God" for the work, in which they had been so remarkably prospered. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Notes, xiii. 1—5. xv. 36—41.) To them they related their success; and shewed how God had, by their ministry, "opened the door of faith," by which great numbers of the poor Gentiles had entered into the church: (Note, xi. 18:) and, finding much work at Antioch, they continued there a long time among the disciples. (Marg. Ref. t—y.)—The thirteenth and fourteenth chapters contain the first history of a mission among the Gentiles. The missionaries were prepared and selected by the Holy Spirit: they were "recommended to the "grace of God," and helped forward by their brethren; leaving country, friends, and comforts, to face dangers and endure hardships, from love to Christ, and to the souls of their unknown perishing fellow sinners: they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Perseverance in doing good, amidst dangers, hardships, ingratitude, and persecution, is a blessed evidence of grace, an expression of "the mind which was in Christ," and a distinguishing mark of his faithful ministers.—The Lord will enable his true and zealous followers "so to speak," and he will so bless their word, that some in every place, and of divers descriptions, will be brought by their labours to "the obedience of faith." But great success commonly causes vehement opposition: and envious and malicious unbelievers excite the minds of those who are more moderate, and render them "evil affected against the brethren." This, however, should not discourage those who are prospered in their ministry: on the contrary, they should labour the more boldly and diligently, depending on the Lord to promote his own cause, and leaving it to him to "bear testimony to the word of his grace," in such ways as he sees good.—In all cities, towns, and villages, where the gospel is effectually preached, a division takes place among the people: some decidedly favouring, and others earnestly opposing the persons employed: and generally some unconverted persons, for a time, take part with the preachers and professors of the truth, by means of whom the Lord restrains the fury of his enemies, till his own purposes are effected.—Wherever his servants are driven, they should seek opportunities of making known his truth, without being intimidated by former perils or sufferings.—None should be considered as having derived benefit from the power and grace of Christ, by means of his ministers and ordinances, till they have "faith working by love," and shew an unreserved obedience: but "all things are possible to those that believe." When we receive this most precious gift of God, we shall be delivered from that impotency in which we were born, and from the dominion of those inveterate habits, which we have ever since been contracting; and be enabled to walk with cheerfulness and thankful constancy in the ways of the Lord.

V. 11—18.

The servants of God might often obtain undue honour to themselves, if they would connive at men's errors and circumcising the gentile converts, but proposes some rules for their conduct, 13—21. Letters are sent by messengers, accompanying Paul and Barnabas, to the churches, with the determination of the council, and that of the Holy Spirit also; which are received with joy, 22—31. Judas and Sias, the messengers, abide at Antioch, and labour there, 32—35. Paul and Barnabas purpose to revisit the churches which they had planted; but are separated by a sharp contention about John Mark; and set out to preach the gospel in different directions, 36—41.

vices; with far greater ease, than they can prevail with them to honour God, by renouncing their vanities, believing his truth, and worshipping his name. But they dread and detest all such sacrilegious homage, more than any reproaches or injuries whatever. They ought never to allow their hearers to think of them, in any other light, than "as men of like passions with themselves;" who, having been taught the knowledge of God and of his salvation, are sent to preach it to those who have hitherto been left to "walk in their own ways."—We should show the greatest affection to the persons of men, and bear with many of their mistakes and prejudices, in a candid spirit: but we must not spare decidedly to protest against their delusions and superstitions, which are as ruinous to the soul as the grossest immoralities.—The Lord saw good for a long time to "suffer all nations to walk in their own ways;" and he still is pleased to leave innumerable multitudes to follow lying vanities: this should lead us to thankfulness for our peculiar advantages, and to adore the depth of his unsearchable wisdom and justice; but it should not induce us to palliate the idolatries or impieties of our apostate race; or to neglect doing all that we can to communicate "the Light of life" unto them. God never "left himself without witness," in any place or in any age: his long-suffering, and the exuberant bounty of his providence, towards enemies and rebels, are very wonderful; and they proclaim how worthy he is of universal love and adoration, and how inexcusable man is in his forgetfulness of him, and enmity against him.—The most eloquent arguments, the most earnest and affectionate address, nay, the most stupendous miracles, are scarcely sufficient to restrain men from the greatest absurdities, or the vilest abominations: much less can they, without his special grace, convert the hearts of sinners to God and holiness.

V. 19—28.

They, who are not established by the grace of God in faith and holiness, are liable to be seduced by ill-designing men from one extreme to another: and to treat those as the worst of malefactors, whom just before they were ready to honour as more than men. This should warn us not to desire or value popularity, or human applause; but to "seek that honour alone, which cometh from" the unchangeable "God." Safety, life, breath, and comfort are entirely at his disposal: and if we have experienced his protection and consolation, in the midst of perils and afflictions; we shall be the better able to "confirm the souls" of weak believers, to exhort them "to continue in the faith," and to animate them to press forward in the way to heaven; though they must pass thither through much tribulation. (Note, Rev. vii. 13—17.)—

AND ^a certain men, which came down from Judea, taught ^b the brethren, and said, ^c Except ye be circumcised ^d after the manner of Moses, ^e ye cannot be saved.

2 When therefore ^f Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and dispute with them, ^g they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and ^h certain other of them, ⁱ should go up to Jerusalem unto ^k the apostles and elders about this question.

3 And, being ^l brought on their way by the church, they ^m passed through

Phenice and Samaria, ⁿ declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: ^o and they caused great joy unto all the brethren.

4 And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were ^p received of the church, and ^q of the apostles and elders; and they declared ^r all things that God had done with them.

5 But there rose up certain of ^s the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying, ^t That it was needful to circumcise them, and to command ^u them to keep the law of Moses.

6 And ^v the apostles and elders came together for to consider this matter.

When proper means have been used, and regulations made, for the edification of new converts, and infant churches; we may confidently commend them, with fasting and prayer, to that faithful, gracious, and powerful Lord, "in whom they have believed," in case we be compelled to leave them, either by removing to another situation, or by death.—If zealous ministers are made useful to souls, they think little of hardships and trials.—Those who have joined in prayer for a blessing on their labours, will be glad and thankful, to hear them rehearse all which God has done with them: and all, who love the Lord Jesus and their fellow-sinners, will rejoice to hear, that he has "opened the door of faith" to those, who before were strangers to him and his salvation.—But, if this meeting of the messengers of salvation with those by whom "they had been recommended to the grace of God, for the work which they fulfilled," was a season of lively joy and gratitude; what will be that meeting, when apostles, evangelists, missionaries, and all who concurred in sending them, or helped them forward, or prayed for them, with all those who eventually derived benefit from their labours, shall assemble before the throne, with unalloyed love, gratitude, and joy, to render praises to their gracious Lord, for all that he has done by them, for them, or in answer to their prayers.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—6. It is probable, that the events recorded in this chapter took place about seventeen years after St. Paul's conversion; but some expositors date them three years earlier. (Note, Gal. ii. 1—5.)—The persons, who taught the Gentile converts at Antioch, that they "could not be saved," unless they were circumcised and observed the whole ceremonial law, came from Judea, and professed to speak the sentiments of the apostles and church at Jerusalem: but they were "false brethren, who came in privily to spy out" and destroy Christian liberty. Their confident decision on the subject could not but prove a great discouragement and temptation to the Gentile converts, and an immense hindrance to the success of the gospel: at the same time, it tended to false sentiments concerning justification, and would eventually have been subversive of genuine Christianity. (Marg. Ref.

a—d.—Notes, Gal. i. 6—10. iii. 1—5. y. 1—6.) For these and similar reasons, Paul and Barnabas vigorously opposed them, and used all their authority, and every proper argument to satisfy the minds of the people, and to silence the false teachers: yet this did not suffice. It was therefore determined, that they should go up to Jerusalem, and refer the matter to the apostles and elders; that by their authority and influence, the controversy might be terminated, and the peace of the church preserved. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) The apostle informs us, that "he went up, by revelation;" the Lord having made it known to him, or to some of the prophets residing there, that he would have him do so. (Notes, Ex. xviii. 17—26.) Accordingly, he and Barnabas set out on their journey, being attended part of the way by the pastors, or principal persons, of the church; who thus shewed their respect to them, and the pleasure which they took in their company, and who probably bore their expenses: and as they passed through Phœnicia and Samaria, they gave a particular account, to the Christians there, of the conversion of the Gentiles, both at Antioch and in the provinces of Asia, which greatly rejoiced them. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) In like manner when they came to Jerusalem, the church, with the apostles and elders, welcomed them; and there they declared, more fully than they had before heard, what "God had done" by their ministry. But though these glad tidings gave general satisfaction; yet some of the Pharisees, who had embraced the gospel, but who still retained an undue regard for the ceremonial law, contended that they ought to comply with its precepts. As therefore there was not an entire agreement upon the subject, it was judged expedient for the apostles, elders, and others of the church to meet together, and to give the important subject a full discussion, in order that it might be finally determined to the satisfaction of all concerned in it. (Marg. Ref. p—t.)—"I know not any reason to conclude, that their 'inspiration' (that of the apostles,) 'was always so instantaneous and express, as to supersede any deliberation 'in their own minds, or any consultation with each other.' Doddridge.—This has commonly been called "The first general council;" and it seems to have also been the last, where it could properly be said, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, &c." (28)

7 And when there had been ^a much disputing, Peter rose up, and said unto them, Men and brethren, ^x ye know how that a good while ago ^y God made choice among us, that the Gentiles ^z by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe.

8 And God, ^a which knoweth the hearts, ^b bare them witness, ^c giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us;

9 And ^d put no difference between us and them, ^e purifying their hearts by faith.

10 Now therefore ^f why tempt ye God, to ^g put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, ^h which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?

11 But we believe, ⁱ that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved even as they.

12 ¶ Then all the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, ^k declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them.

V. 7—11. It is probable, that several of the elders on both sides, spoke with great earnestness on the subject, before the apostles gave their sentiments, and brought the matter to a determination. Indeed, it is not certain that any of the apostles were present, except Peter, James, and John: perhaps the rest were employed in preaching the gospel at a distance. (Note, Gal. ii. 6—10, v. 9.) Those present, however, chose rather to hear the arguments of their brethren, and to shew the ground on which their own conclusions rested, than to decide the question merely by apostolical authority. But at length Peter arose, and reminded the assembly, that some years before, God had expressly chosen him, from among the whole company, and directed him to preach the gospel to Cornelius and his company, that they might be brought to believe in Christ: and the heart-searching God had borne witness to the truth and acceptableness of their faith, by the gift of the Holy Spirit; even as he had done to the believing Jews: putting no difference between them, “having purified their hearts by faith.” (Marg. Ref. u—d,—Notes, x, 3—16. 44—48. xi. 1—18. 1 Chr. xxviii. 4—6. Matt. xvi. 19.)—“The heart” may here signify the soul, with all its faculties and powers; and the expression may refer, not only to the sanctification of the soul by the Holy Spirit, but also to the purifying of the conscience through the blood of Christ from the guilt of sin. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, Heb. ix. 11—14. 1 Pet. i. 22.) Having received this internal purification, through faith in Christ, they did not want the legal purifications, which were types and shadows of these substantial blessings: and as God had, in this first extraordinary case, decided the question; why should his ministers again put it to the trial, as if they would tempt him, to impose so heavy a yoke on the Gentile converts? This did not relate merely to circumcision, but to the whole ceremonial law; which, though proper and useful for the time, required so many distinctions, burdensome purifications, expensive sacrifices, long journeys, and other things of a similar nature; that it was a very uneasy yoke, in every age, even to the inhabitants of the promised land, and still more to those Jews who resided in other countries: and, while it served to prevent idolatry from being universal, it also tended exceedingly to prevent the general diffusion of true religion. (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—“Though these words are by most interpreters applied to the numerous ritual precepts, the costly sacrifices, and the frequent tedious journeys up to Jerusalem; required by the law, which made the observance of it difficult and irksome; I would rather refer them to that defect, that the apostle hath observed in it, that it could “not purge the conscience from the guilt of sin;” (Heb. ix. 9. x. 1;) that it “could not give life,” (Gal. iii. 21;) that it was a killing letter, leaving them under condemnation; (2 Cor. iii. 6—9;) and so making it necessary for them to believe in Christ, that they might be justified, (Gal. ii. 16;) and redeemed from the curse of the law; (Gal. iii. 13;) according to those words of the apostle, xiii. 38, 39. .. For to this sense the following words incline; “we could not bear this yoke; for we “believe that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we “shall be saved.” Whitby.—There was, however, no occasion to impose this yoke upon the Gentiles, as even the Jewish converts did not expect to be saved, in any degree, by observing the Mosaic law, but merely by faith in Christ, exactly in the same manner with their Gentile brethren; though they deemed it a part of their present duty to observe it. (Marg. Ref. i.—Note, Gal. ii. 11—16.) Our believing fathers in old times were saved by faith in a Messiah that was to come, of which the ceremonies were types, sacramental signs, and means of grace: but Christ being come, we shall be saved by him, without those ceremonies.

V. 13—18. When Paul and Barnabas had concluded their narrative, the apostle James closed the conference. He first referred them to the account given by Simeon, (2 Pet. i. 1. Gr.) or Simon Peter, of the manner in which God first visited the Gentiles in mercy, to take from among them a people, to worship and glorify his name: and he shewed them, that, though this was contrary to the prejudices of many among them, yet it accorded with the predictions of the prophets, as, for instance, of a remarkable prophecy by Amos. (Marg. Ref. l—r.—Note, Am. ix. 11, 12.) It was there foretold, that the tabernacle of David would fall and long lie in ruins: but afterwards God promised to raise it up, and build again those ruins. Then all the enemies of the church, represented by Edom, would be subjected; and a remnant of men, even of all the nations, would seek the Lord, and "his name would be called upon them."—This the Lord had undertaken to perform: and as all his works were "known to him from the beginning of the world;" he was now evidently accomplishing his plan, which he had before arranged, and of some parts of which he had given previous intimations. (Marg. Ref. s—z.—Notes, ii. 22—24. iv. 23—28. xvii. 26—29.)—After this, &c. (16, 17) The quotation varies from the LXX, and still more from the Hebrew. The grand outline, however, of the prediction is in all the same. (See on Note, Am. ix. 11, 12.)

V. 19—21. On the ground before stated, James gave it as his decided opinion, that the Gentile converts ought not to be molested about circumcision, or the ritual law; but that it might be expedient and proper, to point out to them some particulars, which they would do well to observe. He then proposed to write to them, that they should abstain from meats, which had been offered to idols, and polluted in that worship, that they might decidedly shew their entire renunciation and abhorrence of idolatry; (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 1 Cor. viii. 7—13. x. 18—33;) and also to caution them against fornication. This was by no means held in such abhorrence among the Gentiles, as it ought to have been; nay, it was generally considered as a trivial matter: and as it was very closely connected with their idolatrous feasts, the new converts might be in peculiar danger of being seduced into it; to the dishonour of their profession, the injury of their own souls, and the great detriment of domestic comfort, and union in the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. d.) This was no doubt a moral injunction, independent of the ceremonial law. So was likewise the prohibition to eat of things sacrificed to idols as connected with its consequences; being in reality communion with idolaters in idolatry: and no doubt it is in force at this day, as a command of the moral law; and must be charged on the consciences of all such as live among idolaters.—The subsequent injunctions are of another nature, and enforced by other reasons. The law of Moses had long been published in the several cities, where the gospel was then planted, being "read in their synagogues every sabbath;" the people therefore every where knew, that the eating of blood was prohibited very strictly. This prohibition was given from reverence to the blood of the sacrifices, which, being the life of the animal, was the essence of the atonement, as typical of that of Christ. It would then have needlessly grieved and stumbled the Jewish converts, and prevented their friendly intercourse with their brethren, and further prejudiced the unconverted Jews against the gospel; if the Gentile converts had shewn so open a disregard to the solemn sacrifices, which were still offered at the temple. This seems to have been the reason of this restriction. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) As long as the sacrifices continued to be offered, we may suppose that it was observed: but “as every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused;” as there is no intimation to this effect in the apostolical epistles; and as the reason of it, which is here annexed, has long since ceased; so we must conclude that we are left as free in this, as in other similar matters. (Note, 1 Tim. iv. 1—5.) The permission given to the Israelites to sell the bodies of animals which died of themselves, to their heathen neighbours; shews, that the restriction of eating blood was ceremonial, not moral. They would not have been allowed to tempt the Gentiles to immorality. (Notes, Lev. xvii. 10—16. Deut. xiv. 21.)—It has been observed by several persons, that if Peter, instead of James, had said, “My sentence is,” it would have given a more plausible argument for Peter’s supremacy, than any which the Papists can adduce.

 V. 22—29. In order to authenticate their decision

more fully, the apostles, and elders, and brethren, thought good to select two eminent or leading persons among them, to go with Paul and Barnabas to Antioch. By them they wrote circular letters, not only in the name of the apostles and elders, but of the whole church, to whom the decision of the assembly was made known, and in which all concurred, to the Christians at Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia; in which they doubtless meant to include all those churches, that were established in other cities. In these, they acknowledged the Gentile converts as “brethren;” and by this term saluted them; and they disowned those persons who had gone out from them, to trouble them with their doctrine, and to subvert the foundations of their faith and hope. (Marg. Ref. l—o.—Notes, 1—6. Gal. i. 6—10. ii. 1—5. v. 1—12. vi. 11—16.) They had therefore unanimously agreed, when met together, to send two other brethren, namely, Barsabas, and Silas, or Silvanus, leading men in the church, (Marg. Ref. i, k,) along with Paul and Barnabas, (whom they greatly loved and honoured, as men who had ventured their lives for the name of Christ,) to inform them of the same things by word of mouth, and to explain them more fully if requisite. For, being warranted to declare themselves directed by the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit; they were assured, that “it seemed good to him,” as well as to them, to impose on them no other burthen, than the things before-mentioned; which were indeed necessary, either on their own account, or in respect of present circumstances; and in attending to them they would do well and be accepted of God. (Marg. Ref. p—f.)—Many suppose, that the determination of God, in the case of Cornelius, was exclusively referred to: but it can hardly be supposed, that the apostles and council, were left without a satisfactory consciousness, in a matter of such peculiar importance, that they were guided in the decision, by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. We may suppose from the harmonious conclusion of the business, that those who at first were of another opinion were at length convinced; and made no

V. 30—35. This epistle, when read at Antioch, settled the dispute in that city, and rejoiced the hearts of the disciples: and the ministry of Judas and Silas, who were prophets, of considerable authority in the church, and of eminent gifts, and spake fully and freely on the subject, conduced greatly to establish them in the faith. (Marg. Ref. g—m.—Notes, i. 23—26, v. 23. xi. 27—30.) So that Silas, having formed an intimate friendship with Paul, and being delightfully employed, did not choose to return with Judas; having a prospect of greater usefulness at Antioch, and perhaps having an eye to that service, which he afterwards performed. V. 36—41. The primary view of Paul, in proposing to Barnabas another journey into those distant regions, was, to revisit the churches which they had planted, and see whether they went on prosperously, and to confirm and edify them: but doubtless he meant also to seek further opportunities of spreading the gospel. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—Barnabas seems to have been too partial to his nephew; and perhaps Paul was too severe with him. (Note, xiii. 13—15.) Doubtless they were both betrayed into undue warmth and pertinacity; which shews the remains of human depravity in the hearts of the best of men: and the impartiality of the inspired historian, in recording it, is worthy of notice. (Marg. Ref. u—y.)—It has indeed been maintained, that, though both were angry, neither of them sinned: but if the one was angry without cause, or above cause, or expressed his anger unduly, he sinned; and if the other gave him just cause, he doubtless sinned. Certainly this never could have occurred, if both had been perfect.—Thus these two fellow-labourers parted, probably to meet no more on earth: neither of them, however, committed any thing of his zeal and diligence, on account of this disagreement; or said any thing, that we know of, to disparage the other: so that two missions were sent forth instead of one, both of which it is probable were “recommended to God,” by the prayers of the brethren; yet the language here used seems more directly applicable to Paul, whose conduct on this occasion was most approved. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) We read nothing further in the history concerning Barnabas; who went first to Cyprus, where he and Paul first preached, when they set out from Antioch. (Notes, xiii. 4—12. 1 Cor. ix. 6. Gal. ii. 6—10.) Doubtless he laboured and prospered to the end of his life; but

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The great enemy of God and man is continually devising measures for obstructing the success of the gospel. For this purpose, he endeavours to make divisions among those who preach and profess it; (Notes and P. O. vi. 1—7;) and to corrupt its purity, and obscure the glory of divine grace in it, by plausibly substituting another foundation; or by introducing such alterations or appendages, as are calculated to mislead or discourage unestablished enquirers. (Notes, 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Gal. i. 6—10.) In these attempts he avails himself of the errors, bigotry, and prejudices of well-meaning persons, and of the ambition and selfishness of false brethren.—Wise and good men will avoid disputation as far as they can; yet they should not determine against all controversy, or condemn it indiscriminately: for when false teachers “come in unawares” to “subvert men’s souls;” when the fundamental truths of the gospel are opposed or perverted, and the principles of men are poisoned by pernicious tenets; we ought to “contend earnestly” (though in meekness) “for the faith once delivered to the saints:” and to decline controversy in these circumstances, argues luke-warmness and cowardice, rather than meekness and wisdom. (Note, Jude 3, 4.)—When fair argument and scriptural evidence fail to convince gainsayers; we must be careful, that we be not seduced to use improper means of conducting the disputation: and if any method of preserving peace and truth can be suggested, we should submit to very great personal inconvenience, or apparent degradation, to accomplish so desirable an end. Sometimes the opinion of those, “who seem to be pillars,” will go further than arguments: and we may fairly, in such circumstances, appeal to their judgment, in order to “stop the mouths” of those, who profess to speak their sentiments; and to satisfy such as have imbibed prejudices, which close their minds to the most conclusive reasoning. But we ought never to be so engaged about any single question, as to neglect opportunities of declaring what God has done for or by us, or of being helpers to the joy of our brethren in every place.—It may be useful for the ministers and disciples of Christ, to meet together, to consider any controverted subject, in order that they may form the more accurate and decided judgment upon it: yet great humility, prudence, temper, candour, and integrity are requisite, to prevent such conventions from degenerating into party-cabals, or scenes of contention and confusion. This has brought ecclesiastical councils and synods into general disrepute: and indeed little good can be expected from them, when they are very numerous; or when they are so constituted, as to give an opening for political contests, or party interests. Yet, select companies meeting in the fear of God, and in the spirit of humble prayer for divine teaching, may help each other to investigate truth, and to decide difficult and important questions. We should, however, remember that the apostles themselves assigned the reasons of their determinations; and did not require the elders and churches to submit to their authority, without knowing the grounds on which they went: and in such discussions, we shall generally, if not always, find, that by examining the source of the subject in question, it will appear to have been already decided by the Lord himself; and that it would be “tempting” him to debate the matter any further.—We “sinners of the Gentiles” have great cause to bless God, that we have heard the gospel. May we have that faith, which the great Searcher of hearts approves, and attests by the seal of the Holy Spirit! Then our hearts and consciences will be purified from the pollution and guilt of sin; and we shall not want any of those burdensome superstitions, which many have attempted to impose “on the necks of the disciples,” instead of the abrogated ceremonial law. Those ordinances which God has appointed as means of grace to our souls, and of rendering him the worship due to his name, we shall delight in attending on; accounting his service perfect freedom, and the Redeemer’s yoke easy and pleasant: and we shall adopt or reject merely circumstantial regulations, as they appear to promote edification, or the contrary. We shall however place no dependence on any of these things; believing that “we shall be saved by the grace of the Lord Jesus,” even as these primitive Christians were.

V. 12—31.

That is undoubtedly the way of eternal life, to which God of old affixed the seal of miracles, which he confirms to us by the testimony of prophets and apostles, and which he blesses for the conversion of sinners in every age and nation. Thus he at first “visited the Gentiles, to take a people from among them” for the honour of “his “name:” and thus is he building the tabernacle, and setting up the kingdom, of “the Son of David,” in every part of the earth. He, “who doeth all these things,” carries on his work according to “the counsel of his own will;” (Note, Eph. i. 9—12, v. 11;) for “known unto him are all his works, from the beginning of the world:” his providential dispensations illustrate and fulfil his word; and it does not behove us to attempt to modify his operations, in conformity with our limited or prejudiced apprehensions. We should not therefore “trouble” those about forms or notions, who are evidently turned unto God; much less ought we to impose on them by authority, or as necessary to salvation, such things as never, at any time, could plead a divine sanction. It may, however, be proper to warn them to keep at a distance from all occasions, or appearances, of those evils, to which they were before most addicted, or to which they are now most likely to be tempted; and strenuously to caution them to use their Christian liberty, with such moderation and prudence, as the good of their brethren, their friendly intercourse with them, and the success of the gospel may render expedient. (Notes, Rom. xiv. 1—6. 13—23. xv. 1—3. Gal. v. 13—15. 1 Pet. ii. 13—17.)—Those who possess influence and authority should support their faithful brethren, whose usefulness may be hindered by the prejudices gone forth against them: they should embrace opportunities of decidedly speaking in commendation of upright characters; and against those, “who trouble” the church, and “subvert men’s souls:” and, if other things are equal, those persons, who have ventured and suffered the most for the name of the Lord Jesus, are entitled to the most respect and affection from their brethren.

V. 32—41.

Unanimity among ministers and Christians gives great weight to their determinations: what they do with one accord, may often be considered as the mind and work of the Holy Spirit; especially when their counsels and measures are evidently consonant to scripture, and conducive to the peace and purity of the church; and when the whole is managed in the spirit of unassuming love: but arbitrary injunctions, and vindictive anathemas, have long distinguished the proceedings of antichristian councils, from those of this Christian synod.—Instructions, arguments, and exhortations are the proper means of producing conviction and obedience, and of confirming men in the faith: and Christian liberty, soberly explained and used, is conducive to consolation and gratitude.—While we approve and imitate the zeal, love, and indefatigable diligence and courage of the apostles, in proposing to revisit the churches, where they had been so persecuted; we must also note the effects of human imperfection in the best of men; that we may watch and pray against all the brethren that were at Lystra and ^f Iconium.

^g 3 Him ^e would Paul have to go forth with him; ^h and took and circumcised him, because of the Jews which were in those quarters: for they knew all that his father was a Greek.

occasions of contention, and all sharpness and pertinacity in contending with our brethren. Yet we should also admire the wisdom of God, in disappointing the devices of the enemy, and over-ruling even the infirmity of apostles, to promote the cause of the gospel: and we should copy their example, in not allowing any personal differences, to take us off from the work, to which the Lord has severally called us; to render us negligent or unfaithful in it; or induce us to say or do any thing, to lessen the character, or obstruct the usefulness, of those faithful, and zealous labourers who, in some things, differ from us.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Barnabas having sailed to the island Cyprus, Paul and Silas journeyed by land, through Syria, into Asia Minor; exercising their ministry as they passed along, both in Syria and Cilicia. (Notes, xv. 36—41.) At length they arrived at Derbe, and Lystra, where they found Timothy, who was already a disciple. He had been piously educated, and made acquainted with the scriptures from his youth; (Notes, 2 Tim. i. 3—5. iii. 14—17;) and he had been brought to believe in Christ, when Paul and Barnabas were before at Lystra. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, xiv. 19, 20. 1 Tim. i. 1, 2.)—“Being well reported of” by his Christian brethren, and endowed with very promising abilities, Paul purposed that he should accompany him in his travels and labours: but, as his father was an uncircumcised Gentile, it was known, that he had not been circumcised in his infancy; and he therefore judged it expedient for him to receive circumcision, previous to his entrance on his publick ministry. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) Not that this was at all needful for him as a Gentile convert; or that the apostle thought the Jewish believers were bound to observe the ceremonial law: but lest the knowledge of his father, as a Gentile, should prejudice the Jews in the adjacent cities against Paul and his ministry; if they had supposed that he had taken an uncircumcised person, to be his intimate companion and assistant: and it would likewise exclude Timothy from preaching in the synagogues, for which he seems to have been peculiarly qualified. He therefore thus far condescended to the prejudices of the Jews: though some time before at Jerusalem, he would not agree to the circumcision of Titus, when it was considered as requisite for salvation. (Notes, Gal. ii. 1—5.)—“After this, Paul laid his hands upon him, and set him apart for the ministerial office, conferring on him extraordinary gifts, (2 Tim. i. 6,) which were attended with prophecies of his future usefulness. (1 Tim. i. 18. iv. 14.) ... He’ (the apostle) ‘always openly avowed, that the gentiles were free from the yoke of the Mosaic ceremonies, and that the Jews were not to expect salvation by them; and he also taught that

‘ they were not in conscience bound to observe them at all, except in cases where the omission of them would give offence.’ Doddridge.—Grotius observes, that this was probably the beginning of Luke’s acquaintance with Timothy, ‘ though Paul knew him long before.’—The apostle’s manner, in speaking of the persecutions which he endured “ at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, &c. ;” though, before he wrote it, he had gone through very many others; implies that Timothy had witnessed his sufferings in that neighbourhood, and would be peculiarly affected by recollecting them. The several churches therefore, where they came, being watered by such faithful labourers, and encouraged with so favourable a decision of the grand point in question, were much confirmed in their adherence to the Christian faith, and increased more and more in numbers daily.’ Doddridge. V. 6—12. It seems to have been at this time, that Paul preached so successfully at Galatia, as to found those flourishing churches, to which he afterwards wrote his epistle. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, xviii. 18—23. Preface to Galatians.) He probably intended to go regularly from place to place in that neighbourhood, planting the gospel as he proceeded; but, by an immediate revelation, the Holy Spirit forbade him to preach in the province of Asia, or in Bithynia; these were distinct parts of Asia Minor, in which the several cities and regions, mentioned in the preceding chapters, were situated. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, xix. 8—12, v. 10. 1 Pet. i. 1, 2.)—It was the will of God, that the apostle and his companions should proceed to a still greater distance from Judea: in the mean time the gospel would be gradually diffusing its influence in those parts, by other means; and we find, that soon after, flourishing churches were established in those very places, where the apostle and his fellow-labourers were at that time forbidden to preach. They therefore went on to Troas, on the coast of the Egean Sea: and, while they were waiting at that city, to know the will of God concerning them; Paul had a vision, of a Macedonian who, as a humble supplicant, said, “ Passing over into Macedonia, assist us; ” from which it was assuredly concluded, that they were commanded to cross the sea into Europe, in order that they might preach the gospel to the inhabitants of Macedonia. Accordingly, they took ship, and passed by the usual course to Philippi, which was a principal city, if not the chief city, in that division of Macedonia; and a Roman colony, being chiefly inhabited by Roman citizens, who had various privileges, and were governed by their own laws. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—y.)—The historian on this occasion begins to speak in the first person plural, saying, “ We endeavoured, &c. ” (10): hence we learn that he attended Paul in this voyage, and probably in most of his subsequent labours; though he modestly avoided mentioning any thing particular concerning himself.—The Spirit, &c. (7) Some manuscripts, and many ancient versions and citations read, “ the Spirit of Jesus. ” The language used, in speaking of the Spirit, is personal and authoritative.—A man, &c. (9) Some think that the apostle knew the person, who appeared to him in vision, to be a Macedonian, by his dress or language; and others suppose, that he resembled some one with whom Paul was acquainted.—It does not appear from the history, that any of the Macedonians were previously enquiring after salvation, (as Cornelius had been,) or disposed to seek direction and help. But the Lord purposed to call many of them by his

V. 13—15. This is the first account, transmitted to us, of the gospel being preached in Europe: though the church at Rome, it is probable, was planted considerably before this time. (Preface to Romans.)—There were Jews residing in most if not all of the cities, which the apostles and evangelists visited; though they appear to have been only a few at Philippi. It seems they had not a synagogue, with rulers: but there was a small oratory without the city, by the river-side, where a few people were accustomed to assemble, for the worship of God, on the sabbath-days. (Note, Luke vi. 12.) Thither the apostle and his friends went, and took the opportunity of discoursing to “the women who resorted thither,” concerning the gospel of Christ: for, it does not appear, that there were any other men in the assembly. (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—Among the rest, there was a native of Thyatira, a city of Asia, who at this time resided at Philippi, to traffick in purple cloths, which were then in great estimation. She seems to have been of Gentile extraction, but proselyted to the Jewish religion: and the Lord was pleased to “open her heart” to attend unto the things which were spoken of Paul, and to believe his doctrine. This implies, that pride, prejudice, the love of sin, and the love of the world, close the heart against the truths of God; till his grace makes way for admission of them into the understanding and affections. (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, Ps. exix. 18. Luke xxiv. 44—49, v. 44.) Thus she was led to embrace the gospel, and was baptized, with her household; the adult part of which no doubt were instructed in Christianity, along with her. There is no proof that there were any children in her family, though it is probable there were: the Syriack version indeed renders it, “the children of her house;” but this only shews the sentiments of those, who made that early translation: and the language here used seems not capable of being consistently used in the narratives of those, who reject infant baptism. (Note, 29—34.)—After this Lydia besought the apostle and his company, if they really considered her to be a true believer, to lodge in her house; for, probably, they had before been very poorly accommodated: and by her urgent invitations she overcame their reluctance, to put her to so much trouble and expense. By this it appears that she was a person rather in affluent circumstances.—Many others seem, about this time, or soon afterwards, to have been converted. (Preface to Philippians.)—Opened. (14) ‘By the grace of God she received the faith. Hammond.—‘To open the ear, or the heart, is a phrase used to signify the rendering any person willing or inclined to do any thing. Ps. xl. 7.’ Whitby. V. 16—18. As the apostle and his friends went from the house of Lydia, to the oratory above mentioned; (Note, 13—15;) they were met by a female slave, who was instigated and enabled by an evil spirit to utter ambiguous predictions, or divinations, after the manner of the priestesses of the Pythian Apollo. Thus she had acquired great reputation, as a kind of oracle, or fortune-teller, for making wonderful discoveries; which were probably accompanied by various agitations and distortions of body, and a peculiar kind of voice and articulation: for these were common on such occasions. By this practice she brought her masters a considerable gain, and became very valuable to them. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) But being excited by the evil spirit, who desired to discredit, and bring into suspicion, the ministry and miraacles of the apostle and his coadjutors, she cried aloud, “These are the servants of the most High God, who shew to us the way of salvation.” For some days Paul waited, perhaps to see in what manner the Lord would silence so disgraceful a testimony to his truth: at length, being grieved by the damsel’s perseverance, he cast name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour.

19 And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the market-place unto the rulers.

20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city, out the evil spirit by the power of Christ; and she returned to the full possession of her faculties, so that she could utter no more divinations: perhaps she was converted to Christianity. (Marg. Ref. q-x.—Notes, Mark i. 23-28. 34.)—This transaction demonstrates, beyond all controversy, that such pretensions are not always human impostures, but are sometimes real satanical operations. Had this damsel's divination been a mere juggle between her and her masters, the command of the apostle could not have detected it, or prevented them from carrying on the deception: nor could he at once, or indeed at all, have convinced the whole multitude, and the city in general, that it was a mere imposture; for men are by no means easily undeceived in matters of this nature. And if mere jugglers had been convinced, that Paul and his friends were indeed "the servants of the true God," and teachers of the way of salvation; they would never have ventured to address them in this manner.—But, as the woman was really instigated, and in a sense inspired, by an evil spirit; and as, in the paroxysms of her distraction, and amidst strange and wild actions and gestures, she actually uttered such things, as were apparent prophecies and wonderful discoveries; such as Satan could at any time make, by his foresight, and conjectural knowledge, if God would permit him; (Note, Deut. xiii. 1-5;) the change was manifest, when the dispossession took place; and all concerned were fully satisfied, that she could divine no longer, and that it was in vain to apply to her for that purpose.

21 And teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.

V. 19-24. The owners of this damsel, being sensible that no further lucre could be made by her, and that her value, if offered to sale, was greatly diminished, were exceedingly exasperated by their loss: and when they had seized on Paul and Silas, and accused them before the magistrates as disturbers of the peace, and teachers of unlawful customs; the multitude also, being enraged at the loss of their prophetess, joined in the tumultuous accusation. (Marg. Ref. y-d.) Whereas, had the apostle satisfactorily detected an artful impostor; they who had been

convinced of the cheat, would have been enraged at those who had duped them of their money, and not at him who had undeceived them.—It does not appear, that the Jews were forbidden to exercise their religion at Philippi, or in other cities of the Roman empire, at this time; so that the accusation was altogether malicious and groundless. Yet the magistrates, concurring with the popular fury, violently rent off the garments of Paul and Silas; and, having severely scourged them, without any previous trial, they east them into prison and charged the jailor to keep them safely; as if they had been dangerous and artful criminals, who would certainly effect their escape if possible. And he, being probably a man of a severe temper, and desirous of pleasing his employers, and perhaps despising them on account of their religion, cast them into the inner prison, or the darkest and most noisome part of the dungeon; and there fastened their feet in the stocks, which must have rendered their situation very painful. (Marg. Ref. e-i.) Thus they were left, with their wounds undressed, in the cold and dark dungeon, without any refreshment, to wear away the night, expecting the next day to be further proceeded against. (Note, 1 Thes. ii. 1-8.) But neither they, nor any of the persons concerned, thought of that most gracious design, for which the Lord had permitted these sufferings to come on them.—Timothy, and Luke, and the rest of the company, as less noticed, were exempted from this severe trial.—Gone. (19) The same word is used, as before, when the evil spirit went out; 'as if the hope of their gains had removed from them, along with the unclean spirit.' Beza.—Being Jews. (20) The Christians were here confounded with the unconverted Jews, as both protested against the Pagan worship. But, had the worship of JEHOUAH been contrary to any Roman law, then in force, and actually carried into execution, no Jews could have remained in any of the cities where colonies were planted. It appears, that some statutes to this effect had been enacted; but doubtless it was generally found impracticable to execute them; and so they became obsolete, except when an occasion was sought of gratifying malice and cruelty by persecution.

V. 25—28. It might have been expected, by those who know not the consolations of God, that Paul and Silas would have vented their feelings, in bitter lamentations, and exclamations against the cruelty and injustice of the treatment which they had received. Yet "at midnight," when their wounds and bruises would naturally become doubly painful, they first poured out their hearts in prayer; and doubtless remembered their persecutors, especially the jailor: and, being thus filled with divine consolation, they joyfully sang praises to God, so loudly that the other prisoners heard them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Note, Jam. v. 13.) At this very time, the Lord was pleased to bear testimony to their innocency, by an extraordinary earthquake, which probably was felt all over the city; but which especially shook the foundations of the prison, burst open all the doors, and in a wonderful manner brake off the bonds and fetters of all the prisoners: and yet no person was hurt by it! Nor does it appear, that any of the prisoners attempted to escape! This tremendous concussion awakened the jailor, who supposing, from the doors being open, that the prisoners, especially Paul and Silas, had fled, was about to murder himself. For he expected to be called to a severe account, and to be disgraced, or put to an ignominious death, for allowing them to escape: (Notes, xii. 5—11. 18, 19:) and therefore, according to the false notions of honour which then prevailed, and in a mixture of infidelity, pride, and desperation, he was about to plunge himself into eternity, with all his unrepented sins upon his head, by another act of most daring contempt of God and rebellion against him. But Paul discovering, either by his exclamations, or by a divine monition, what he was about to do, cried out aloud, (being in earnest to save him) from destruction, even as if he had been a friend, or brother,) intreating him "to do himself no harm," for he and the other prisoners were there; not having attempted to take advantage of these awful events, nor purposing to do it.

V. 29—34. The friendly address of Paul and Silas to the jailor, connected with the extraordinary interposition of God in their favour, seems to have been made effectual by the Holy Spirit, at once to convince him, that these were indeed "the servants of the most high God;" though probably, he had before derided that pretension, and concurred with those who persecuted them on that account. (Note, 16—18.) Thus he was led to a conviction of his guilt, in treating them with cruelty and contempt, as well as to a sense of his former sins: and he trembled, lest he should immediately be destroyed by the righteous vengeance of God, and sink into misery in another world. Yet remembering, that they came to "shew men the way "of salvation," he seems to have conceived hopes of that deliverance. Calling therefore "for a light," in great haste and terror, he came in and fell down before Paul and Silas; and first (as a proof that he began to relent and be sorry for his sin,) bringing them out of the stocks and the inner prison, he addressed them in the most re-

h 27—29. II. 46. them, ^h and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

35 ¶ And ^l when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go.

36 And the keeper of the prison told this saying to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go: now therefore depart, ^k and go in peace.

37 But Paul said unto them, ^l They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay, verily; but ^m let them come themselves and fetch us out.

38 And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates: ⁿ and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

spectful manner, “saying, Sirs, what must I do to be “saved?” By being saved, he doubtless meant deliverance from present death, and from future condemnation. (Marg. Ref. u—a.—Note, xxiv. 24—27.)—“He spake ^t thus to them, as knowing, or conceiving, from the words ^u of the Pythoiness, that they were appointed to shew to ^v others the way of salvation.” Whitby. Nor were they reluctant, on account of past injuries, immediately (though an unseasonable hour, and themselves greatly in need of ease and rest) to give instruction and encouragement to him; or led to despair of his salvation, or to prescribe harder terms to him than to others, because of his atrocious crimes: on the contrary, they exhorted him to “believe in the Lord Jesus Christ,” and assured him that in doing this he would certainly be saved. (Marg. Ref. b.) This faith implied a belief of their testimony concerning Jesus, as the promised Messiah, and concerning his person, character, sufferings; death, resurrection, and ascension; and a reliance on him for all things pertaining to salvation.—They also included his household in this assurance: not that his faith could save them: but his example might lead them to believe in Christ also; and with him they would become a part of the visible church, and have the benefit of the means of grace for their salvation. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, ii. 37—40. xi. 4—17, v. 14. Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Luke xix. 1—10, v. 9.)—They then instructed him and all his family more fully in the doctrine of the gospel: and the Lord so blessed the word, that he was immediately humbled, softened, and changed from a lion as it were into a lamb: so that he first compassionately washed and dressed their stripes, and then professing faith in Christ, he was baptized in his name; though he might fear the heavy displeasure of the magistrates, for thus embracing the cause, which they had set themselves to oppose: and at the same time all his household was baptized likewise. (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Now, therefore, regarding Paul and Silas with the greatest respect and most endeared affection, he brought them into his house, and entertained them at his table. (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Matt. x. 40—42. xxv. 34—40. Gal. v. 1—6, v. 6. 1 John iii. 13—15.) At the same time his trembling was turned into joy.—“He rejoiced with all his house,” “having believed in God.” (Note, 13—15, v. 15.)—When a Gentile householder was converted to the Jewish religion, all the males in his family, including infants, were circumcised with him, unless any of the adults, after instruction, refused to be so: it is therefore obvious to suppose, that the same rule was observed, in the baptism of those households, of which we read in the New Testament; for it has already been shewn, that the covenant sealed to Abraham, was the same as the Christian covenant; and that circumcision was the sign of the same blessings, of which baptism now is. (Note, Gen. xvii. 9—12.) And the language, concerning the baptism of believers and their households, so much accords to that concerning the circumcision of Abraham and his household; that, in connexion with other scriptures; with the general and early use of infant-baptism in the primitive church; and with the consideration that we do not read in the New Testament of one single instance, in which the children of Christian parents were baptized adult; it must be allowed strongly to countenance the sentiments and practice of pædo-baptists: though we suppose, that the change of the initiatory ordinance, as far as infants were concerned, was silently and gradually; like that respecting the sabbath: the Jewish converts still circumcising their male children, to avoid giving needless offence to the unconverted Jews. (Note, 1—3.)—It seems also most probable, to me at least, that Paul and Silas, in their painful condition, and in the jailor’s house, did not baptize him and his family by immersion.

V. 35—40. Perhaps the earthquake, and the reports of what had taken place at the prison, concurred in dismaying the magistrates from proceeding further against Paul and Silas: they were, however, no doubt conscious that they had done more than they could justify: and they therefore sent their serjeants, or beadles, to give orders to the jailor to release them; which he delivered to them with great joy and affection. all disposed to avenge himself; judged it proper to remind these iniquitous magistrates, that they had acted illegally, and might be severely punished for it: because this would tend to procure more equitable treatment for the Christians, and indeed for the other citizens, in future. In the tumult of the proceedings against him and Silas, the day before, they had not thought it expedient to plead their privilege as Romans, or no notice had been taken of their plea: but Paul now charged the magistrates with scourging them publicly and imprisoning them in a cruel and ignominious manner, though they had not been condemned of any crime, and though they could prove themselves Roman citizens. And now they meant to set them at liberty, in an underhand manner, that they might conceal their own injustice. He and Silas, however, did not choose to go away, under the imputation of having deserved such punishment: if therefore the magistrates desired that they should depart, they must come themselves, acknowledge their fault, and dismiss them in a more honourable manner. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) This reply might well alarm them: for, as no man could claim the privilege of a citizen falsely, without exposing himself to the severest punishment; so a prosecution for such illegal treatment of Roman citizens would have subjected the magistrates to heavy penalties, and incapacitated them from ever again exercising authority; if not to capital punishment. They therefore came, and submissively intreated Paul and Silas to leave the city, lest further commotions should be excited, in which they might not be able to protect them: and, as the apostle by no means intended to require reparation for the injury, he and Silas went to the house of Lydia, and, having visited and encouraged the other new converts, they departed.—The epistle to the Philippians, shews, what a flourishing church was at this time planted; and in what a happy manner these troubles terminated. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

“The wisdom that is from above” is peculiarly requisite, that we may know when, and how far, we may bear with men’s prejudices, in order to their edification; and when we must resolutely protest against them. (Note, 1 Cor. ix. 19—23.) But if a man have it at heart to carry his point, as far as possible; and if he be delivered from the prevalence of pride, selfishness, obstinacy, and moroseness; he will be directed by circumstances, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to act according to the word of God: yet his conduct will often appear incongruous and inconsistent, to the superficial observer. (Note, 1 Cor. ii. 14—16.)—The greatest precaution should be used, that the ministers of Christ be men of good report: lest prejudices against individuals should be added to the carnal enmity of the human heart against the gospel, to prevent their success; and that such as “are of the contrary part” may have no evil thing to say of them.” Scriptural regulations, therefore, in this and similar concerns, tend exceedingly to the establishment of believers in the faith, and to the increase of the church in numbers. (Notes, 1 Tim. iii. 7. Tit. ii. 7, 8.)—We have no ground to expect to be directed by immediate revelation, in the various actions of our lives: but, while we act according to the best of our judgment, in obedience to the word and dependence on the Spirit of God; we shall find circumstances, apparently casual, operate as prohibitions and directions, subverting our plans, and substituting others in their stead.—“He that holds the stars in his right hand,” directs his ministers to the several places, where he means to employ them; and often contrary to their own plans and expectations.—When we are, by any means, satisfied of the Lord’s will respecting us; we should prepare for obedience, to whatever hardship, labour, and peril it may expose us: and those who go in simplicity, faithfulness, and affection, to preach the gospel among ignorant or careless sinners, do the most for their help and benefit that man can do: though it seldom happens, that persons of this character are forward to invite them. The deplorable condition, however, of our fellow creatures, in very many parts of the world, and even their insensibility to their own danger and misery, ought to stimulate our exertions, to carry or send them effectual help; and to aid, by our labours, contributions, and prayers, every scriptural attempt for that purpose. Nor should we forget, that it was this generous and tender compassion for the inhabitants of this quarter of the globe, without any desire or request from us, or our ancestors, or even from those to whom they were sent, which induced the apostles and evangelists to “put their lives in their hands,” and come over into Europe to help us. And could they now address us, it would probably be in these few but emphatical words, “Go thou and do likewise.”

V. 13—24.

While the servants of Christ wait upon him in his ordinances; he will find them some opening to speak in his name: nor should the most eminent minister be averse to preach to a very small number of the most obscure persons.—The Lord alone can “open the heart” for the reception and belief of his word; (Note, 1 Cor. iii. 4—9:)

He preaches the living God, the Creator and Lord of all, as hitherto unknown to the Athenians, 22—29. He calls on them to repent; because God will judge the world by Jesus, whom he has raised from the dead, 30, 31. Some mock, others purpose to hear him again, and a very few believe, 32—34.

and true faith is always attended by love shewn to the servants of Christ: his genuine disciples desire to approve themselves faithful stewards, to “use hospitality without grudging,” and to employ their substance in supporting and promoting the gospel; and they commonly prove a blessing to their households also.—The powers of darkness vary their methods, of prejudicing the minds of men against the light of the gospel, or drawing off their attention from it.—Lying miracles, and useless divinations, are far more valued, in this evil world, than the truths and precepts of God are: men readily incur expense for the former; but refuse the latter, even when freely communicated: they are much more desirous of being told their fortune, than their duty, or even “the way of salvation!” and impostures, in endless variety, have been used to deceive mankind, and to set them against true religion.—Satan, the father of lies, can declare the most important truths, when it subserves his purpose of deception and murder: and, if he were permitted, he could do more mischief, by ingeniously connecting the doctrines of the gospel, with pernicious errors and immoral practices, than by any species of superstition, persecution, and infidelity. Much he actually effects in this way, by means of antinomian, enthusiastical, and scandalous preachers; who, being confounded with the real servants of Christ, bring them also into contempt and abhorrence, with thousands, nay millions of superficial observers. But we must strenuously disclaim such coalitions: and commendations, from bad and suspicious characters, should more excite our grief and indignation, than all their calumnies and reproaches.—The conversion of sinners, “from the power of Satan unto God,” often deprives those connected with them, of the gains which they made by their vices: thus the gospel interferes with the worldly interests of those, who will do any base thing for money, and prefer the gain of unrighteousness to the lives or souls of those employed by them: and this concurs with other principles, in exciting their rage and persecution. (Notes, xix. 23—31. P. O. 21—31. Note, 1 Tim. vi. 6—10, vv. 9, 10.) So that those who do more good than others, by drawing sinners off from the service of the devil, may expect to be reviled as men, who “exceedingly trouble the city:” and while they teach men to fear God, to repent of sin, to believe in Christ, and to live sober, righteous, and godly lives; they will be accused of teaching customs, which are illegal, impracticable, or ruinous to the community! Too often indeed the laws of the state interfere with those of God, and the customs of the world contradict the wisdom and holiness of his service: yet, interested opposers frequently make these things a mere pretence for persecution, while they are actuated by avarice, ambition, or revenge alone. The vilest of malefactors may, therefore, expect more favourable treatment than zealous ministers, who will not let sinners go on unmolested in the ways of destruction.—Pride, cruelty, contempt, and enmity, often concur in uniting the mob and the magistrates against them. And if we, in this happy land, escape abuse, stripes, dungeons, the stocks, and the stake; we should bless God for our mild government, and that equitable constitution by which he secures us: and shew our gratitude, by praying earnestly for our rulers, and by turning away our ears from those innovators, whom nothing but licentiousness can satisfy.

V. 25—34.

The consolations of God are neither few nor small to his suffering servants: he gives them, in answer to their prayers, songs in the darkest night of tribulation, and in the most painful and dreary situation.—What different persons are true Christians, from what they are supposed to be! They are happier than their most prosperous foes, who do their worst to make them miserable: they need not to be strictly guarded, when God requires them to lodge in a prison; and walls, bolts, fetters, and keepers are as nothing, when he wills them to be at liberty. In the most destitute state they have an omnipotent Friend; all nature stands ready to plead their cause; they are capable of becoming the best of benefactors, in their most abject penury; and they are ready to do good to their most cruel enemies.—How wonderful also are the varied methods of divine grace! and how unlikely the objects of it! The Lord sometimes brings sinners acquainted with himself, by occasion of their own crimes; and frequently through the sufferings of his servants. He gently, and by degrees, leads some into the knowledge and experience of his truth: others he alarms by most tremendous dispensations, and snatches them by a gracious violence from the jaws of destruction. (P. O. Luke xix. 1—10.) Some are brought as near to hell, as can be conceived; and then are suddenly rescued and made heirs of heaven. Under the influence of their mad passions, many have been powerfully instigated by Satan, to plunge themselves into the bottomless pit by their own hands; just at the time, when God was about to lead them into the ways of peace and felicity. Thus he illustrates and demonstrates the sovereignty and efficacy of his grace; and gives occasion to praises and thanksgivings, which will be varied almost infinitely to all eternity.—Whatever men have been, or have done to us, we ought not to “render evil for evil;” but, if possible, to prevent them from doing harm to themselves: and we should be as earnest in this, on proper occasions, with respect to our greatest enemy, as if he were our brother and friend.—When sinners begin to enquire, under terror and distress of conscience, with earnestness, and a desire of immediate instruction, “what they must do to be saved;” especially when their conduct shews any disposition to relent, and “to do works meet for repentance;” they should all be answered in the same manner, whatever their previous character has been: “Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.” None can be saved in any other way: none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way. Yet it is not enough merely to state this unexplained truth, we should further instruct men, in respect of the object, nature, and effects of this faith, as we have opportunity: and when sinners are converted, they will soon learn to love and honour those, whom they before despised and hated; they will alleviate the sufferings, which before they derided and augmented; they will supply the wants of the indigent servants of God, and join themselves to them, by professing their faith in Christ, and venturing reproach and persecution for his sake; and they will desire, that all who belong to them, may be devoted to the Lord, and trained up in his service. When such fruits of faith begin evidently to appear, we need not be surprised, if terrors are speedily succeeded by confidence and joy in God: and thus the events which menaced the most fatal consequences, often terminate in mutual congratulations and thanksgivings; and the richest of blessings on the families to which they belong.

V. 35—40.

The servants of Christ should suffer persecution peaceably, and forgive injuries readily: yet there may be cases, in which it will be proper for them to claim the protection of the laws, and to protest against the flagrant injustice of oppressive magistrates; especially when they violate the laws of their country which they are commissioned to execute, in vehement zeal against the objects of their contempt and aversion. This (which is far different from resisting the execution of the law itself, when deemed unreasonable,) may conduce to publick justice, the peace of the church and of the community, and the credit of their profession. (Notes, xxiii. 1—5. Rom. xiii. 1—5.) But when proper concessions are made by those who have acted illegally, Christians should never express personal resentment, or insist strictly upon reparation; but manifest a disinterested publick spirit in every thing. Thus their enemies will be ashamed, silenced, or conciliated; the Lord will make them “more than conquerors” in every conflict; and, instead of being cast down by their sufferings, they shall even become the comforters of their brethren, who have been exempted from so large a share of tribulation. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 1—7, vv. 3—6.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1—4. Either no Jews resided at Amphipolis and Apollonia, or the apostle had no opportunity of preaching among them; at least no mention is any where made of his labours or success in those cities. He therefore journeyed on to the west, till he arrived at Thessalonica, the city in which the Roman governor of Macedonia resided. (Marg. Ref. a.) And there, according to custom, he went to the Synagogue, and reasoned from the scriptures, to the Jews and the other worshippers there assembled, for three successive sabbath-days: adducing many passages from the prophets, explaining their meaning, and thence evidently shewing, that according to the prophets the promised Messiah was to suffer death and to rise again; and proving, from the exact fulfilment of these predictions, that Jesus was indeed the Christ, or the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) These reasonings did not convince the Jews in general, for their hearts were set upon a temporal kingdom: yet some of them believed, or were persuaded, and united themselves to Paul and Silas; and a great many of the worshipping Gentiles believed; and among the rest, several of the principal women in the city. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) From the Epistles to the Thessalonians it is evident, that the apostle was remarkably successful among the idolatrous Gentiles also; and that he continued here a considerable time: but after the first three sabbaths, it is probable, he left the Jews, and preached chiefly to the Gentiles.—As the historian says they, not we; it is conjectured that Luke stayed behind at Philippi, and did not join the company till some time after.—‘Upon inspecting the history, I see nothing in it which negatives the supposition, that St. Paul pursued the same plan at Thessalonica, which he adopted in other places; and that, though he resorted to the synagogue only three sabbath-days; yet he remained in the city, and in the exercise of his ministry among the Gentile citizens, much longer; and until the success of his preaching had provoked the Jews to excite the tumult and insurrection, by which he was driven away. ... The Alexandrian and Cambridge manuscripts read των σεβομενων και Έλληνων πολυ πληθος’ (“of the worshippers, and of the Greeks a great multitude.”) ... If we be not allowed to change the present reading, ... may not the passage ... be considered as describing the success of St. Paul’s discourses, during the three sabbath-days, in which he preached in the synagogue? and ... that his application to the Gentiles at large, and his success among them, was posterior to this? Paley.—It appears from the epistles to the Thessalonians, that the church at Thessalonica was chiefly formed of converted idolaters; and that St. Paul and his companions entered very particularly into the several parts of Christian doctrine and duty, in their practical instructions of the new converts, before they left the city: and in writing to the Philippians, the apostle observes, that they had sent twice to supply his wants, when at Thessalonica. (Notes, Phil. iv. 14—20. 1 Thes. i. 9, 10. iv. 1—5.) These things shew that he laboured in this city much longer, than the three sabbath-days here mentioned.

5 But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people.

6 And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also;

7 Whom Jason hath received: and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying, That there is another king, one Jesus.

8 And they troubled the people, and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things.

9 And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go.

10 ¶ And the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea: who, coming thither, they went into the synagogue of the Jews.

11 These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so.

12 Therefore many of them believed; also of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men, not a few.

13 But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also and stirred up the people.

14 And then immediately the brethren sent away Paul, to go as it were to the sea: but Silas and Timotheus abode there still.

15 And they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens: and receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all speed, they departed.

V. 5—9. The unbelieving Jews were enraged, and filled with envy, or fierce zeal, because the apostle preached to the Gentiles that they might be saved. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, xiii. 42—48. xiv. 2. 1 *The*s. ii. 13—16.) They therefore raised a mob, from among the lowest and most licentious people in the city, who threw every thing into disorder; and then they violently assaulted the house, where the apostle and his company generally lodged, in order to drag them before the people as publick disturbers.—Jason, the owner of this house, seems to have been a relation of Paul, and a Jew. (Rom. xvi. 21.)—Paul and his friends were absent or concealed at this time: the multitude therefore dragged Jason, and some other of the new converts, before the magistrates, or rulers of the city; exclaiming, that the men, of whom they had heard many reports, as having excited great confusion in every place, and who attempted innovations, tending to "turn the world upside down," and subvert the established order in religion and civil government, were at length come thither also; and that Jason had lodged them in his house, and had embraced their doctrine, as many others had done. (Marg. Ref. o—s.) They had all, however, broken the edicts of the Roman emperor, and rebelled against his authority: for they avowed that there was another King, one Jesus who had been crucified; who, they averred, was risen again, and was exalted to a dominion far superior to that of Cæsar, and entirely independent on him. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) This accusation gave great disquietude both to the magistrates, and the assembled multitudes: as they feared the displeasure of the emperor, if they should neglect such a charge; and yet they knew not how to proceed upon it. At present, however, they only required Jason and his friends to give security for their peaceable behaviour, and to make their appearance if further called on.

adjacent city: and when they came thither, they, without delay, fear, or resentment, proceeded to make known the joyful tidings, concerning the Messiah, to the Jews assembled in the synagogue. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) These proved to be of a more ingenuous, candid, liberal, and teachable disposition than the Jews of Thessalonica; and more deserving of the honourable distinction of Abraham's seed, in which the nation in general gloried: for they applied their minds, with all readiness and seriousness, to the word which the apostle preached to them; and though they did not implicitly receive his doctrine, or submit to his arguments; they impartially and diligently investigated the subject. They not only heard him preach on the sabbath-days, or at other times; but they "every day" employed themselves in searching the scriptures, and comparing its predictions with the facts attested to them. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Matt. xiii. 23. Luke viii. 4—15, v. 15.) Thus many of them were led to a full conviction of the truth; and with these Jews several religious proselytes, and some of the most affluent and honourable women of the city, embraced Christianity. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) But the envious Jews of Thessalonica, hearing of this success, followed Paul and Silas to Berea, and there excited a storm of popular fury against them. And, as Paul was most obnoxious to them, it was judged necessary for him to recede from the danger: they therefore conducted him towards the sea-coast, that it might be supposed he was about to embark for Asia. But he at length changed his course, and arrived at Athens, the most renowned city of Greece; having left his fellow-labourers behind him, to regulate the affairs of the church at Berea; and, having sent word to them to come as soon as they could to him, he waited for them there.—It does not appear, that Silas came to him, while at Athens: and Timothy, when he arrived, was sent from Athens back to Thessalonica, as we learn from the first epistle to the Thessalonians: and both he and Silas again joined the apostle at Corinth. V. 16, 17. It is probable, that the apostle did not at first intend to enter on his ministry at Athens, till Silas and Timothy joined him: perhaps, he had not determined whether he should attempt to publish the gospel there, or pass over into Asia. While, however, he continued in this renowned city, the centre of polite learning, philosophy, and the fine arts, and, as it were, the university of the Roman empire, and of the world; he took little notice of the sculpture and edifices, the fragments of which to this day are considered as the most perfect models of their kind; or of their paintings and exhibitions, and other curiosities of this sort. Paul is generally allowed to have been a man of fine taste and cultivated genius; but his thoughts were too much occupied about more sublime and interesting subjects, to make observations on these elegant or magnificent trifles: (Note, Luke xxi. 6:) for his spirit was agitated, grieved, sharpened, and filled with zeal, indignation, and astonishment, to see a city, which was thought to be so peculiarly enlightened, wholly devoted to the most stupid idolatry. (Marg. Ref. n.)—It has been asserted that there were more idols at Athens, than in all the rest of Greece: the Athenians always imported the deities and superstitions of every nation, along with their arts and learning; so that a satyrist ludicrously observed, 'It was easier to find a god, than a man, in that city.' This fact most completely demonstrates the insufficiency of science and philosophy to guide men in matters of religion. The barbarous Scythians, the wild Indians, nay, the stupid Hottentots, have never deviated further from truth, or sunk into grosser darkness, in respect of God and religion, than the ingenious and philosophical Athenians did!—The apostle, however, was thus excited to begin his labours without delay: and first in the synagogue he proposed his doctrine to the Jews and proselytes; and, reasoning with them from the scriptures, he earnestly endeavoured to convince them that Jesus was the Messiah: (Note, 1—4, v. 2:) but he does not appear to have had great success among them. This was probably on the sabbath-day.—He also argued and reasoned every day in the marketplace, or forum, with such of the philosophers, students, or others, as he could meet with: (Marg. Ref. o—q:) for there these men were used to converse and debate concerning their different opinions: and the forum was as much the place in which they met for this purpose, as the change is the place of meeting for the merchants in London.

V. 18. In the forum, the apostle was encountered by certain philosophers of different sects. The Epicureans were gay and superficial infidels, who amused themselves and others with various curious speculations. They ascribed the original of all things to chance: they professed to allow the existence of the gods; yet they contended, that they did not interfere in the creation or government of the world, but indolently satisfied themselves with their own undisturbed felicity : they deemed the enjoyment of this present world the supreme good, and they denied a future state of rewards and punishments. The Stoicks allowed the existence of the gods, but supposed them to be bound by eternal and irresistible fatality ; they affected almost to extinguish their own feelings and passions ; they were most extravagantly proud and obstinate ; they judged a virtuous man, according to their notions of virtue, to be independent of their deities, and in some respects superior to them ; and spoke as if he might defy fate itself : they maintained that virtue was its own reward, and expressed themselves very obscurely about a future state of retributions. (Marg. Ref. r, s.)—These two sets of philosophers, being alike opposite in their tenets to the doctrines of the gospel, and being full of the pride of superior learning, encountered Paul, and thought of silencing him in the argument : and some of them despised him as a babbler, or a man who had picked up a few scraps of learning in different places, of which he wanted to make a shew ; and as one who was fond of hearing himself speak, even among those who had studied so much more than he had. But others concluded, that he meant to introduce some new deities to their notice : for, being accustomed to deity virtues, vices, health, diseases, &c. they supposed that he preached to them Jesus as a God, and Anastasis, or the Resurrection, as a goddess, whom they ought to worship in preference to any of their present idols. V. 19—21. As a multitude seems to have collected around the apostle and his opponents, the latter conducted him, not as a criminal, (according to the opinion of some expositors, which is contrary to the whole narrative,) but as a philosophising speculator, to the Areopagus, or principal senate of Athens : and before that renowned body, and a number of philosophers, and other citizens and strangers, they civilly requested him to shew them more accurately, what was the new doctrine which he taught ; for in all their reading and enquiries, they had never met with the sentiments, which he had delivered. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) This enquiry was merely the result of vain curiosity : for all the Athenians, and the strangers who came thither to study, from every part of the world, occupied themselves almost entirely in devising, learning, or propagating some new sentiment or speculation, having no leisure for any thing else. (Marg. Ref. a.) The word signifies newer : the new imagination, or system, of the preceding year, month, or week, soon became like an almanack out of date : it was the taste of the age and place to discard and antequate every hypothesis, as soon as it became vulgar ; and to substitute some newer scheme in its place : and lively ingenious students, especially in metaphysics, commonly run into this humour. If Paul therefore could start some newer speculation, than the newest fashion of philosophy among them, his doctrine would at least gratify and amuse them.

Some learned men think, that the word Areopagus is not properly translated "Mars' hill," or the hill of Mars, as it does not appear, that a temple was built to Mars, in the place where the Areopagus convened. They argue, that the name was derived from the trial of murderers by the court there held. (See on Matt. v. 44.) The nature and functions of this court, or senate, which was highly celebrated in those ages and countries, must be learned from the Greek antiquaries ; being far too complicated a subject for this publication.—The contemptuous neglect, and the interruption, which the apostle's admirable address met with from it, constrains the impartial enquirer to question, how far such a court, or council, deserved the encomiums so lavishly bestowed upon it.—Strange things. of his curious auditors. He observed to them, that he perceived them to be in all things, exceedingly addicted "to the fear of demons," or the worship of invisible beings. The word is ambiguous, and might be understood either as a commendation or a censure; and doubtless he chose it for that reason, to convey the implied censure, in the most inoffensive manner. Xenophon uses the word, when commending one as a religious man. The Athenians were indeed very religious in their way; but that was altogether superstitious and idolatrous. In surveying the city, and especially the temples, and the manner and objects of their worship, he had met with an altar inscribed "To the unknown God." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—d.) It is attested by many writers that there was such an altar: and some think, that, having imported the deities and worship of most other nations; they had erected this altar to the God of the Jews, who was always spoken of as invisible and incomprehensible, and whose names the Jews themselves scrupled to mention. Various other conjectures have been formed: but perhaps, after multiplying their deities to the utmost, some of them suspected, that there was one God superior to all their idols, of whom they yet had no knowledge; and therefore they prevailed to have an altar dedicated to him also. Either way it suited the apostle's purpose, to make this inscription the motto of his discourse; and he informed his learned audience, that he came to declare to them this "unknown God," of whom they confessed themselves ignorant, even while they professed to worship him. Indeed, he was the great Creator of heaven and earth, which neither existed from eternity, nor were produced by chance, or by necessity, as some of their philosophers had imagined; but were formed by the One living, self-existent, eternal, almighty God: and as he was the Proprietor and Governor of heaven and earth, he could not be supposed to inhabit temples, as their idols did; nor could he be served with the workmanship or oblations of men's hands, as if he wanted something to consummate his felicity: seeing he himself was the universal Benefactor, and the Source of being, life, breath, and all things

V. 26—29. This glorious God had formed the whole race of men of one family, in that one man and woman, from whom they were all descended; that they might dwell upon the face of the earth as brethren, without injuring each other: and neither blind chance, nor invincible necessity, but God, the sovereign Lord of all, had, in his infinite wisdom and justice, appointed the different ages of the world for the accomplishment of his predetermined counsels and decrees; and had allotted to every one the period in which he should live, and "the bounds of his habitation." (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, Deut. xxxii. 9.) All this was intended to lead them to seek after him and his favour, and after the knowledge of his perfections, his works, his truth, and will, which was shewn to them in the visible creation: if by any means, in their present state of error and ignorance, they might grope after him, as men in the dark, and find him; without which all other science would be of no real value. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Rom. i. 18—23. Heb. xi. 5, 6.) Yet the difficulty of knowing the true God did not arise from distance, or his unconcern about human affairs, as the Epicureans vainly supposed; but from very different causes: for in fact "he was not far from every one" of them; as in him all lived, moved, and existed, and must perish without his upholding power. This even some of their own poets had allowed, being in this matter far wiser than the philosophers: for one of them, (called Aratus,) had said, "We are also his "offspring," and others had expressed nearly the same sentiment. If then men were the offspring of God, the absurdity of representing the Deity himself, by gold, or silver, or stone, however exquisitely fashioned and carved, must be evident; as nothing of this kind could do more than form an imperfect resemblance of man's exterior form, without at all representing even the functions of animal life, or the operations of his mind. V. 30, 31. God had indeed long borne with men's apostasy, ignorance, and idolatry: he had acted, as if he would not look upon their provocation, in giving his glory to abominable idols: and, while he continued his providential kindness, he sent no prophets to the nations in general, to call them off from idolatry to the worship of his name. But "the times of this ignorance" were expiring; and by his servants he now "commanded all men, "every where to repent" of their idolatry and all other sins, and not to attempt any excuse or vindication of their conduct. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—This was a most bold demand on the self-wise and self-admiring stoicks; and as opposite to their notions of virtue and of fatality, as to the epicurean sentiments of chance and pleasure.—The apostle further added, that though they should at present escape with impunity; yet God had "appointed a day," when he would summon all the inhabitants of the earth to his tribunal, and judge them in perfect righteousness, rendering to every man according to his work. This he would do, by that extraordinary Person, "the Man Christ Jesus," who was constituted the universal Lord and Judge of the whole human race. Of this, God "had given" the fullest "assurance to all men," by raising him from the dead, which was proved by most unexceptionable testimony. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—Thus far the apostle was permitted to proceed in introducing his subject; for much more he certainly intended to say, had not the levity and petulance of his audience constrained him to desist.—Contrast this address with the speculations of the Greek philosophers; with those of the Epicureans and the Stoicks in particular. In this contrast, it appears dignified, rational, sublime. It asserts the Being and Unity of God;

that he created the world, and all things in it; his universal providence; the intimate relation of men, all over the world, to each other; (though his hearers, the Greeks, had been accustomed to call the rest of mankind barbarians;) the palpable folly of idolatry, and its criminality, with calls to repentance: and it sets before them a future judgment, and a life beyond the grave: all this in the compass of a few verses, in which not a word seems redundant, yet nothing is defective! Whoever reflects on the endless mazes, in which these wise philosophers of Athens, and indeed all those of the ancient world, were wandering, on all these subjects, so awfully interesting; and compares the solid rationality of the sentiments, here so simply proposed, with their vain but ostentatious wisdom, must be very much struck indeed.—Then with regard to evidence. They had nothing to offer, but abstruse and bewildering reasonings, which were perfectly incomprehensible by the mass of mankind, and which brought home no effectual conviction to the mind of any one. All was among them without certainty, and without authority. But the apostle was able to confirm his doctrine, by arguments intelligible to all; the conclusiveness of which human nature feels, and cannot but feel. He would have appealed to miracles, (particularly the resurrection of Christ,) and to various other proofs; but his tired audience refused to hear him out.—The manner of the apostle likewise, in addressing these idolaters and philosophers who were strangers to the ancient scriptures, and his reasoning with them on such principles as they allowed or could not deny, should be compared with his addresses to the Jews, who professed to believe the scriptures, and with whom he argued on the ground of that profession. Christianity might indeed be established by proofs, wholly independent of the Old Testament: yet it called men to believe nothing, as actually accomplished, but what had been predicted, typified, or promised. Of this the inspired preachers never failed to avail themselves, in addressing the Jews; both as a most conclusive proof that their doctrine was from God, in addition to all miracles and other internal and external evidences: and also, as peculiarly interesting to those who possessed, and professed to reverence, the sacred oracles. But to have brought proofs, from scripture, to idolatrous or philosophizing gentiles, would have been highly irrational: and St. Paul's example especially, in this particular, cannot be too carefully studied and copied by all, who are called to address infidels, or idolaters, or persons totally ignorant and careless in the concerns of religion.

V. 32—34. It is probable, that the Epicureans led the ridicule, by deriding “the resurrection of the dead,” as an impossibility or absurdity: the rest of the company, however, found the apostle’s doctrine too solemn, alarming, and practical, for their vain and curious minds; and therefore they declined hearing any more on such subjects, till another time. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 19—21. xxiv. 24—27.) The apostle was indeed treated at Athens with more exterior civility, than in some other places: but none despised or neglected his doctrine with more supercilious indifference, than these speculating philosophers; and this, as it appears, proved the worst soil, in which he ever attempted to sow “the good seed of the kingdom.” Yet even here grace triumphed over the prejudices of one senator, and a woman of considerable note, with a few others; who believed the gospel, and further attended on the apostle for instructions: but there is no proof or intimation, that a church was founded at Athens. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

It is most evident from this history, that the zealous servants of Christ must be despised and hated, by all kinds of unconverted persons for his sake. Nothing, however, shall in any wise hurt them; and nothing should dismay them, or deter them from publishing the glad tidings of salvation.—We ought to “reason” with our hearers, and to prove our doctrines with conclusive arguments; and not merely to address their imaginations and affections: but our reasonings should be deduced from the word of God, or grounded on it, or suited to call men’s attention to it; otherwise we shall lose ourselves in empty speculations, or go beyond our depth. But when we clearly open and explain the scriptures, and support our conclusions by testimonies of holy writ; when we thus evidently lay before men those truths, which relate to the person, sufferings, resurrection, and kingdom of Jesus Christ; and then apply these subjects to their hearts and consciences, by pathetick addresses, warnings, and persuasions; we use the proper means of bringing them to “the obedience of faith;” and may expect to see our labours blessed to many souls.—But how strange is it, that men should grudge and envy others, those privileges, of which they will not themselves accept! and that zeal for religious creeds or systems should induce them “to take to themselves wicked men of the baser sort,” to set cities in an uproar, to assault and destroy men’s houses, and to lay wait for their lives! Such proceedings disgrace and betray every cause which they are brought to support: and the friends of truth and piety must mourn and lament, if any of their professed associates, take weapons of this kind

33 So Paul departed from among them.

34 Howbeit ^c certain men clave unto him, and believed: among the which ^d was Dionysius ^d the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them.

from the enemies of God and his people, and use them to their annoyance. Mobs are always incompetent judges of liberty and privileges: and how egregiously absurd is it, for them and their leaders, to exclaim against others, as disturbers of the peace and order of the community!—Indeed the gospel is intended, in a certain sense, “to turn the world upside down:” for sin and Satan have inverted the right order of things; and when the kingdom of God is established in the hearts of men, an entire revolution takes place, in their judgment, maxims, affections, conduct, and conversation. (Note, 2 Cor. v. 17.) In this respect we should all desire and endeavour “to turn the world upside down;” and should pray that ministers may be sent to every part of the earth, whom the Lord will employ in effecting this blessed revolution among men.—But the kingdom of Christ is not of this world: and his most faithful servants will be the most peaceable subjects to that authority, which Providence places over them; they will be ready to obey the decrees of Cæsar, unless he command them to break the laws of their other and more exalted “King,” even “Jesus” “the Prince of the kings of the earth;” and then they will meekly endure persecution for conscience’ sake. In general, they will leave it to the children of this world, to contend about civil liberties and immunities; except when called on to perform a constitutional duty as members of the community, or when required to act in a publick station. So that neither rulers nor people need be troubled, at the increase of real Christians: though many turbulent spirits, making religion the pretext, will ambitiously join in faction and rebellion, and thus bring a disgrace upon the gospel. Of such we should beware; from such we should withdraw; that we may give all reasonable security for our good behaviour in civil society, while we claim the undoubted right of worshipping God according to our consciences.

V. 10—15.

True dignity and nobleness of spirit greatly consist in an enlarged and unprejudiced mind, open to conviction, willing to investigate the truth, to examine the evidence adduced in support of men’s opinions, and to treat religious enquiries with candour, seriousness, and diligence. Such an ingenuous and teachable disposition comes from above: (P. O. Jam. i. 9—18, vv. 16—18. iii. 13—18:) those who possess it cautiously avoid a blind credulity, an obstinate bigotry, and a heedless conceited incredulity: they receive the word of sober teachers “with all readiness of mind;” and, knowing their need of divine instruction, they “daily search the scriptures, to see whether things be so, or not:” impartiality, humility, and industry combine in their researches, and the truth requires no more. Men of this character will gradually rectify their mistakes, obtain solutions of their difficulties,

CHAP. XVIII.

Paul goes to Corinth, meets with Aquila and Priscilla; works with them as a tent-maker; and preaches, first to the Jews, 1—5; and, when they opposed and blasphemed, to the Gentiles with more success, 6—8. Encouraged by a vision, he remains there a long time, find answers to their objections, and be led into a solid understanding and firm belief of the gospel. (Notes, Hos. vi. 1—3, v. 3. John i. 47—51. vii. 14—17.) And when this “noble” disposition is found in those, who are also honourable in society, it forms a distinction peculiarly valuable and useful. But nothing can be more ignoble and base, than bigotry and persecution; and many, who appeared devout in their way, have in every age and place, been most inveterate against the truth, and most active in stirring up others to oppose it.

V. 16—21.

The spiritual mind, however ingenious or cultivated, can take little delight in contemplating the most admired productions of science and genius, while it observes, that the persons concerned are wholly enslaved to sin, or given up to impiety and infidelity.—Not only do unlettered savages “sit in darkness, and the region and shadow of “death,” but even those cities and persons, that are most renowned for civilization and science, are often enveloped in the deepest ignorance, in the things of God and eternity. Indeed, none are more childish in their superstitions, more impious in their speculations, or more credulous of absurd impostures, than some of the most eminent persons for genius and learning have been and are. Thus “God hath made foolish the wisdom of this world:” he has “taken the wise in their own craftiness;” and has made way for the display of his glory, in saving sinners “by the foolishness of preaching.” (Notes, 1 Cor. i. 17—31.) The consideration of the state of the world, both wise and unwise, should deeply affect our hearts; while we avow our belief of the sacred scriptures, and contend for the doctrines revealed in them. Yet, if in “the meekness of wisdom,” we should venture to start such topics “as Jesus and the resurrection,” either in the busy resorts of commerce, in the courts of justice, in the schools of the philosophers, or in polite company, even in this Christian land; numbers would frown, deride, or exclaim: while Epicureans, and Stoicks, and speculators of jarring tenets, would unite in “encountering” us with their arguments, or shewing their contempt of us, as vain babblers, or as innovators in religion. And should any seem to pay a more respectful and civil attention to our discourse; it would probably be in order to gratify a vain curiosity, and to hear ‘the new doctrine,’ as they would call it. For though the truths of the gospel are, in some respects, as old as the fall of man; yet they are often “strange things” in the ears even of the learned: and they, whose lives have been almost entirely spent in studying, hearing, or telling “some new thing,” are frequently totally unacquainted with “the good old way” to heaven; and talk about it in the most obscure and perplexed manner. Indeed, every thing is new to him, who has never heard it

9—11. The Jews bring him before Gallio, the consul, who refuses to attend to such questions, 12—17. Paul returns by Ephesus to Jerusalem, goes thence to Antioch, and revisits the churches which he had planted, 18—23. Apollos preaches at Ephesus. and being more fully instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, he goes to Achaia, where he labours very successfully, 24—28.

before; as the letters of the alphabet are to children, when first taught to read: thus men’s deep ignorance is the real cause, why the gospel is stigmatized by them as “a new “doctrine!” But modern speculators seldom shew so much respect to the preachers of the gospel, as the Athenians did to Paul; for they are aware that the doctrine of the cross will afford little gratification to curiosity and vain-glory; and that conclusions may be drawn from it, very inimical to their carnal pursuits and sinful lives.

V. 22—29.

In addressing mankind about their souls and eternal salvation, or its awful reverse, we should study their peculiar dispositions and opinions; and enquire what truths they admit, and what errors they maintain. Thus we may be able to combat them, from their own principles, and gradually point out the absurdity of their tenets, and the inconsistency of their conduct: and we may often graft the truth on such sentiments as they allow.—Alas! how many are there to this day, who have their devotions and superstitions, and are exceedingly zealous for them; yet the great Object of all worship is to them “an unknown “God!”—They are not acquainted with the mysterious manner of his subsistence, the glory and harmony of his perfections, or the way in which he will be approached and served. If such men allow the truth of the scriptures, we may reason with them from those sacred oracles: otherwise, we should lead them, from self-evident principles, or such as admit of the most obvious proof, to see their need of a revelation, to attend to the evidences of its divine original, and to the beneficial tendency of the things contained in it. Thus we may declare unto them “that “God whom they ignorantly worship;” and gradually lead them, from the works of creation to the great Creator; and from his providential care and bounty, to their obligations to love and worship him, and their criminality in ungratefully neglecting him. From a view of his perfections and authority as the great Proprietor and Lord of all, we may expose the vanity of superstition and idolatry: and of all mere outward forms, oblations, and services; by which men have sought to recommend themselves to God; as if they could benefit him, “who giveth to all life, and “breath, and all things.” We may also infer, that the end and design of God in our creation, and of all his appointments towards us, and of our special advantages, is, to lead us to seek and serve him “in spirit and truth,” that we may find him, and true happiness in his favour. Hence we may shew how men grope in the dark, and proceed amidst bewildering doubts and uncertainties, in this most important matter, though the Lord is near unto us, and “we live, move, and exist in him;” and thus prove their need of his word and Spirit, to lead them into a spiritual acquaintance with him. From the rational nature of man, who is in this respect “the offspring,” and bears the image of God, we may infer the absurdity of many established customs and sentiments, which degrade the infinite God even beneath the level of his creatures. Sometimes we may produce the testimony of poets and prophets of their own, in confirmation of our sentiments: and if a man have acquired classical learning and general knowledge, he may thus make a good use of them; yet it is scarcely advisable for those, who are intended for the ministry, to spend any very great proportion of their valuable time, about those indecent fables and corrupt principles and practices, which must engross much attention, from those who aspire to proficiency in this kind of learning.

V. 30—34.

Notwithstanding all the renown of Athens, and of ancient Greece, God deemed those “the times” and places “of ignorance:” and though he connived at the dishonour there put upon him, yet he did not excuse the impiety and iniquity of the inhabitants. He commanded them, yea, he commands us, and “all men every where to repent:” nor will any proud pretensions to virtue, or vain reasonings about necessity or contingence, or any philosophical or theological system, excuse men in neglecting this call. All men every where need repentance, and must perish without it: all, who repent and believe the gospel will be saved; and this is every man’s duty, though no one is disposed to perform it without the grace of God. (Notes, Luke xiii. 1—5.) But the sins, committed in the time of a man’s ignorance, will be far less severely punished, than those which are perpetrated, in defiance and contempt of the light of the gospel.—In calling men to repentance, we should always direct their attention to that “appointed day, when God will judge the world in righteousness;” and to Jesus and his authority, salvation, death, and resurrection: and whatever introduction we use, all our discourses must lead to him, and centre in him.—But even the most consummate wisdom and address, united with the purest zeal and simplicity, in the teacher, will often leave the hearers under the deeper condemnation. Some reject the word with supercilious contempt and mockery; and others from indolence, levity, and procrastination. Of all subjects, that gains the least attention which deserves the most: men profess an intention some time to hear it again; but this time never arrives to numbers. It shall, however, be brought to their remembrance at the great tribunal, to seal their condemnation.—No persons are more likely to fall into these snares of Satan, than self-conceited scholars, and scoffing scepticks and infidels. But “if they scorn, they alone must bear it.” The minister must be satisfied with having faithfully delivered his message; nay, even if he be interrupted by the petulance of despisers, before he can conclude his subject. The word of God, however, will never be absolutely useless: some Athenians, and some senators, as well as others, “will cleave to the Lord” and his faithful servants; and these may be useful to others in due time. So that we should go on with our labours, in patience and hope, “whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—6. The apostle seems to have had so little prospect of success at Athens, that he left it as soon as he well could: though it does not appear, that he was in any degree persecuted. Accordingly, he went to Corinth, in Achaia, (within the peninsula called Peloponnesus,) a city remarkable for opulence, elegance, luxury, and licentiousness. Here he met with Aquila, a Jew, who was a native of Pontus in Asia, but had resided for some time at Rome, where it is probable, that he was converted to Christianity, with his wife Priscilla. They had, however, lately been expelled from that city, as Jews, by the edict of the Roman emperor; who was induced to treat all of that nation, as seditious and dangerous persons. Some think that the preaching about this time at Rome, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and “the King of Israel,” gave occasion to this severity: but this is very uncertain. (Marg. Ref. a—e.)—Paul, however, being acquainted with the character of these two excellent persons, went to lodge with them; and, having in his youth learned their trade of making tents, which were much used in those warm climates, he wrought at it for his livelihood.—It was an excellent custom in those days, for such persons as received a liberal education, to be also instructed in some mechanical trade: this served them as an amusement in prosperity, and was a certain resource in case all other prospects failed.—Whatever assistance Paul received from the churches at Antioch, or Philippi, or other cities; he was often reduced to great necessity, by the expenses of his journeys: and we learn from many intimations in his writings, that he frequently wrought with his own hands for his subsistence, lest he should be chargeable to his converts. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, xx. 32—35. 1 Cor. iv. 9—13. 1 Thes. iv. 9—12. 2 Thes. iii. 6—9.)—On the sabbath-days, however, as usual, “he reasoned” with the Jews at Corinth in the synagogue, concerning the kingdom and salvation of Christ; and endeavoured to “persuade” both them, and the Gentiles who joined in their worship, to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. But when Silas (who perhaps had staid some time at Berea,) and Timothy were come to him, to confirm his testimony, and most solemnly to obtest, that Jesus was indeed the predicted Messiah; he was inwardly excited by the Holy Spirit to still greater vehemence of mind, in bearing testimony to his Lord: and when the Jews opposed his doctrine, and even blasphemed the name of Jesus, “he shook his raiment” as renouncing all fellowship with them: and, to add emphasis to his warnings, he declared, that they were likely to perish in their sins by their own default, as murderers of their own souls; but that he, having faithfully delivered his message, was pure from the guilt of their ruin; and would therefore go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g—i. 1—p.—Notes, xiii. 49—52. xx. 25—27. It is not to be supposed, that the apostle was excited, or constrained, by a vehemence of natural temper, to act improperly on this occasion: and if the ardour of his own spirit was holy, no doubt it was excited by the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, how can it be supposed, that the Holy Spirit urged and constrained him, except by exciting and invigorating holy affections in his heart? (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Jer. xx. 7—9. V. 7, 8. It is probable, that the apostle continued to lodge and work with Aquila and Priscilla: though he no more preached in the synagogue; but used the house of a Gentile, who had renounced idolatry before his conversion to Christianity, and perhaps had been circumcised. This circumstance might tend to give the Jews, who desired it, an opportunity of still attending his preaching. Indeed several of them had already embraced the gospel; especially the chief ruler of the synagogue, with all his family: and many afterwards were converted, and received into the church by baptism, both of the Jews and Gentiles. V. 9—11. The apostle at this time seems to have been greatly discouraged in respect of his ministry, by the virulent enmity of the Jews, and the dissolute character of the Gentiles; and especially by a consciousness of his own insufficiency, and manifold infirmities. (Notes, 1 Cor. ii. 3—5. 2 Cor. x. 7—11. xii. 7—10. Gal. iv. 12—16.) The Lord Jesus, therefore, condescended to appear to him in vision, to obviate his fears, and to embolden him in his labours, to assure him of his protecting presence, and to inform him that he had “much people in that city.” (Marg. Ref. y—c.—Notes, xxiii. 11. xxvii. 20—26.) In this he evidently spake of those, who were his by election, the gift of the Father, and the purchase of his atonement, though at that time in an unconverted state; (Notes, John vi. 36—40. x. 14—18. xi. 49—53;) and what sort of persons these at Corinth then were, the apostle has in another place informed us. (1 Cor. vi. 9—11.)—Thus encouraged, he fixed his abode at Corinth for a year and a half, during which time he planted a very numerous and flourishing church. (*Marg. and Marg. 16) he calls those his sheep who should hereafter believe 'in him.' Whitby. Thus, in opposing the doctrine of God's decrees, and predestination, the original depravity and carnal enmity of the human heart, and the necessity of regeneration, are virtually denied, or at best, totally lost sight of. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—"God who is rich in mercy, for his great love, wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ; by grace are ye saved." (Notes, xiii. 42—48, v. 48. John iii. 3—8. Eph. ii. 4—10. Tit. iii. 3—7.)—Were such persons as the idolatrous licentious Corinthians disposed of themselves, independently of divine grace 'pre-venting them,' to embrace the humbling pure gospel of Christ; and to change their jovial and sensual rites, for the spiritual worship of the heart-searching holy God? Does this doctrine accord with the ninth and tenth articles of our church? And would it not have been called Pelagian, before the term Arminian was known?

V. 12—17. Gallio is supposed to have been the brother of Seneca, the renowned pagan moralist; and he bears a fair character in history.—As the Jews were allowed the free exercise of their religion at Corinth, they supposed that he would exert his authority against those, who innovated on their ancient customs: they therefore tumultuously seized on Paul, and dragged him to the Roman tribunal; and, with much contempt, accused him of inducing men to worship God, in a manner contrary to their law. But when the apostle was about to plead his own cause, and to embrace the opportunity of declaring the gospel before Gallio; that magistrate refused to take any cognizance of such matters. He declared, that if any person had been defrauded or oppressed, or if any mischievous licentiousness had been committed; it would have been reasonable for him to attend to the fact, notwithstanding the irregularity and clamour of their proceedings: but, as their dispute related only to their religious peculiarities, the names of Jesus, and the Messiah, or the obligations of the Mosaic law, on all that worshipped the God of the Jews; they should decide for themselves, for he would not trouble himself about such subjects. With this answer he dismissed them, and ordered them away from the judgment-seat, with apparent sternness. And when the Greeks violently assaulted and beat Sosthenes, even in Gallio's presence, he took no cognizance of this breach of the peace, for he "cared for none of those things."—It is not agreed who Sosthenes was: some think that he was the same person as Crispus, before mentioned (8); others, that he succeeded him as chief ruler of the synagogue, when Crispus embraced Christianity. Some think that he was the leading person in the prosecution of Paul, and that he was contemptuously and cruelly treated by those Greeks, who favoured the apostle: others conjecture, that he was a Christian, and that the Jews excited the Greeks to abuse him, when they could not prevail to wreak their malice on Paul. We afterwards read of Sosthenes, among the apostle's chief friends: (1 Cor. i. 1 :) if this was the same person, as it is probable from the manner in which Luke mentions him; the latter opinion is favoured by it: for the conversion of a leading persecutor would scarcely have been passed over in silence.—The Alexandrian manuscripts and some ancient versions read Jews, instead of Greeks; and it has been conjectured that πάντες (they all), was the original reading, and that some transcribers took the liberty of inserting Greeks, and others Jews, in the copies which they wrote. This indeed would remove the difficulty, and clearly shew that Sosthenes was a christian; but the authority for the alteration, is scarcely sufficient to warrant the conclusion. See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ.—Gallio's conduct in this transaction has been considered in very different lights; some having severely condemned it, and others having highly approved it. Doubtless he acted properly, in refusing, as a magistrate, to give any assistance to persecutors, or to interfere with the determination of religious controversies: but there evidently was a contemptuous disregard of all such topics, as wholly unworthy of his notice: he probably deemed both Jews and Christians to be ignorant and deluded fanatics; and concluded that it was of no consequence who was right or wrong, in disputes of this nature. A mixture of philosophical scepticism, and of political contempt of religious concerns, compared with affairs of state, seems to have influenced his conduct. (Notes, xxiii. 25—30. xxv. 19. xxvi. 24—32.) As he would not use his authority against Paul; so he would not protect Sosthenes, or punish the injury done to him: and the historian evidently blames him, because, "he cared for none of these things."—"This profane man thought this a controversy rather of words than of things; and considered the doctrine of God as vain words." Beza.

Was the deputy. (12) Ἀνδραπατευοντος.—Here only.—See on xiii. 7.—Dr. Lardner justly observes, ... that this is another instance of the exact propriety with which St. Luke expresses himself. For, though the province of Achaia, which comprehended all the rest of Greece, had a more various fortune than that of Cyprus, and fre-ment-seat: and Gallio cared for none of those things.

18 ¶ And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila, having shorn his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow.

19 And he came to Ephesus and left them there: but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews.

20 When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, he consented not;

21 But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus.

23 And after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.

24 ¶ And a certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures, came to Ephesus.

25 This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and, being fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.

26 And he began to speak boldly in the synagogue: whom when Aquila

he purposed, for reasons which are not here specified, to be at Jerusalem at the ensuing passover: but he promised to return to them, if the Lord would permit him. (Marg. Ref. a-f.—Note, Jam. iv. 13—17.)—The voyage and circuit here briefly stated must have taken up a long time: yet they are related in very few words; which shews, that the design of the narrative is not so much to gratify curiosity, as to give an instructive specimen of the manner, in which Christianity was at first propagated. The travels, labours, and success of the apostle also were far greater, than a superficial reader would suppose; for the events of years, and the conversion of thousands, are sometimes recorded in a few verses. The apostle sailed from Ephesus to Caesarea; from thence he travelled by land to Jerusalem: (Note, xxiii. 23, 24:) and having shewn his affection and respect to the Christians there, and finished the business which he had in view, he went down thence to Antioch in Syria. After a while, he set out a third time from that city, to preach the gospel in Asia Minor; and so he passed again through the several cities and regions, where churches had before been planted: among the rest, through the churches of Galatia, (Note, xvi. 6—12,) encouraging and animating the disciples, regulating their affairs, and doubtless making numerous converts. V. 18—23. Notwithstanding the tumultuous enmity of the Jews, the Lord Jesus continued to protect his servant, while he abode a considerable time longer at Corinth. (Note, Rom. xvi. 1, 2.)—At length, however, he took a pious and affectionate farewell of the new converts, and set sail for Syria; being accompanied by Aquila and Priscilla, who intended to settle for a time at Ephesus. But before he embarked, he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, the port of Corinth, on account of a vow which he had taken, respecting some of his multiplied deliverances. (Marg. Ref. u. y.) Probably, this was of the nature of the Nazarite’s vow: but when the distance prevented a person from going to Jerusalem, at the expiration of the term; it seems, that he was customarily dispensed with, in cutting off his hair in another place, and not at the sanctuary. Perhaps some casual defilement made it necessary for the apostle to cut off his hair, and begin again the appointed term: and being at so great a distance, it might be judged allowable to do this at Cenchrea; and to offer the required sacrifices when he came to the temple. It is not indeed recorded, that he did offer them; but this by no means proves that he did not. (Note, Num. vi.)—When the apostle arrived at Ephesus, where he left his friends Aquila and Priscilla; he took the opportunity of setting before the Jews, in that city, the substance and evidences of his doctrine: yet he would not be prevailed upon to stay longer with them; as tion, by faith in the Messiah; as far as it could be learned from the ministry of John the Baptist, and his testimony to Jesus, whom he pointed out, as "the Lamb of God," "the Son of God," the "Bridegroom of the church," and the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Notes, John i. 29—34. iii. 27—36.) It does not however appear, that he had ever been among the Christians; nor is it known when, and by whom, he received Christian baptism: and there is no proof, that he had at this time any miraculous powers. But, being very zealous and "fervent "in spirit," for the honour of God, and the interests of true religion; he went from place to place, diligently teaching the Jews what he knew concerning the necessity of "repentance, and fruits meet for repentance," as a preparation for the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. On these subjects he boldly preached in the synagogue at Ephesus, in the hearing of Aquila and Priscilla: and they perceiving his ability, zeal, and piety, said nothing to his disadvantage, though they found that he had very imperfect views of those subjects on which he spoke. On the contrary, they formed an acquaintance with him, and shewed him more completely the doctrine of the gospel, and the things which had taken place in respect of Jesus Christ: and he, with the most amiable humility, received their instructions, and so obtained more adequate qualifications for his important work. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) At length, he determined to go into Achaia, and to Corinth: and, by their recommendatory letters, he was introduced to the Christians there; and proved exceedingly useful to them, and successful in convincing the Jews, in the most publick manner, that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

 V. 1—8.

While the zealous ministers of Christ carefully shun whatever may entangle them in the affairs of this life; they will submit to any hardship or labour, which may be rendered subservient to their usefulness, or remove obstacles out of their way: and to work at a trade, for daily bread, in order to preach the gospel without charge, differs exceedingly from carrying on lucrative business, in order to grow rich, and live in abundance, in connexion with the office of an evangelical preacher.—The knowledge of any thing, by which an honest living can be earned, is a very valuable acquisition: it never can prove injurious to any man; it cannot be taken from him; and it may, on one occasion or other, be peculiarly useful to him.—Even among affluent persons, the ministers of Christ are more likely to do good, by shewing an entire indifference to all those things which wealth can purchase; than by affecting a style of living, which emulates that of the very persons, from whose liberality it requires and almost demands support.—The love of Christ is the best bond of friendship; and the communion of the saints sweetens labour, contempt, and even persecution.—Cogent arguments and affectionate persuasions should concur, in our endeavours to lead sinners to faith in the Saviour; but when great neglect or contempt is manifested; we should be "pressed "in spirit" to testify to the truth with greater vehemence, even though it may excite more virulent opposition: and we must warn those who "contradict and blaspheme," that they will perish, and "their blood will be upon their "own head," if they reject that faithful testimony, by which we keep ourselves pure from the guilt of their destruction. When some oppose the gospel, we must turn to others; (Note, Heb. vi. 4—6;) and our regret, that so many persist in their unbelief, should not prevent our gratitude for the conversion of some to the faith of the divine Saviour. (Notes, and P. O. Luke xv. 1—10.)

V. 9—23.

The most eminent, useful, and courageous ministers experience seasons of dejection and anxiety, through consciousness of their own unworthiness and defects, the prospect of perils and difficulties in their work, and the determined enmity and opposition of many among whom they labour. But the Lord Jesus knows, and will obviate all their fears: he will encourage them "to speak, and "not hold their peace;" and he will teach them to trust in his protection amidst all dangers; while he gathers in his chosen flock from those places, in which they are scattered before their conversion. Even the irreligion and in-

CHAP. XIX.

Paul, arriving at Ephesus, finds disciples who knew only John's baptism; and, having instructed them, and baptized them in the name of Christ, he confers on them the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, 1—7. He preaches, first in the synagogue; and then very successfully in a school for two years, God confirming his word by miracles, 8—12. Certain Jewish exorcists, attempting to cast out a devil in the name of Jesus, are driven away naked and wounded, 13—17. Many, who had used magical arts, are converted, and burn their books, 18—20. Paul purposing to go into Macedonia, and then to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Rome, sends friends before him, 21, 22. Demetrius, and the silversmiths at Ephesus, raise a mob against him, to support their gainful traffick and the worship of Diana; and this is attended with great uproar and confusion, 23—34. fidelity of rulers, though exceedingly criminal in itself, has often been over-ruled for the protection of the disciples of Christ. Whatever be their motives, such magistrates as take care to prevent, or impartially to punish, those crimes which are injurious to the welfare of the community; and who refuse to use their authority in persecuting one religious sect at the instance of another, or in imposing doctrines, forms, and modes of worship on men's consciences; certainly best understand and perform the duties of their office. Yet, indifference to all religion, and to the infinitely momentous interests of eternity, is no necessary concomitant of toleration, but rather a disgrace to it; as it shews that rulers, of this description, are actuated merely by indolence and worldly policy, and not by a regard to the rights of conscience, or by a sense of their duty to God: and their toleration or protection of his worshippers, will often be partial and contemptuous, and attended by improper connivance at those who violate the peace of society; as well as a total and systematical neglect of the due improvement of the talents entrusted to them. We should, however, be thankful for security, thus continued to us, in Providence; and we must not forget to pray for those who seem more to regard the liberties of mankind, than the salvation of their own souls.—We ought simply to promote, in our several places, the cause of Christ; forming such plans as seem to us most proper for that end, and relying on the Lord, to enable us to accomplish them, if he see good. But alas! how immensely short do we come, in active zeal, diligence, and patience, to the indefatigable “apostle of the Gentiles!” And with what earnestness and alacrity, did he proceed from city to city, and nation to nation, to strengthen the disciples, and make known the salvation of Christ to perishing sinners!

V. 24—28.

When natural talents for argument and elocution unite with great diligence in studying the scriptures; and when they are attended with fervent zeal, piety, and humility; they qualify a man for doing much good by “teaching diligently” and accurately “the things of the Lord.” And even, if persons thus qualified and disposed, are at

And if faithful counsel and instruction are taken in good part, and duly improved; and popular young men are thus open to conviction, and willing to learn from those, who in some respects may be deemed their inferiors; they will make a rapid progress in knowledge, and maturity for usefulness: and they may soon be recommended as useful helpers to those “who have believed through grace;” as well as able defenders of the gospel, against those who set themselves to oppose it.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—4. After Apollos was gone to Corinth, Paul, having travelled over the upper or inland parts of Asia Minor, establishing the believers and promoting the gospel, arrived at Ephesus, a rich and famous city on the coast of the Egean Sea; where he had before left Aquila and Priscilla, who had privately been making way for his preaching the gospel to the Jews residing in that city. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, xviii. 18—28.) There he found some religious persons, who expressed a regard to Jesus, as the Messiah; and he enquired of them whether, having believed, they had received the Holy Spirit, in respect of his miraculous gifts. To this they replied, “We have not so much as heard, whether there be any Holy Ghost;” by which they must at least have meant, that they had never been led to expect his miraculous powers, or informed of any thing respecting the extraordinary communication of them to believers, at that time; or about the gospel being especially “the ministration of the Spirit.” (Marg. Ref. d, c.—Notes, John vii. 37—39 2 Cor. iii. 7—11.) ^e As Apollos had left Jerusa-come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus.

5 When they heard this, ^l they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.

6 And when Paul had ^k laid his hands upon them, ^l the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied.

7 And all the men were about twelve.

8 ¶ And he ^m went into the syna-

lem, and gone to Alexandria, before the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, at the day of Pentecost: so had they also done, and had been travelling into other parts of the world, where the gospel had not yet been planted. Whitby. This is not improbable: and perhaps, like Apollos, they endeavoured to communicate to the Jews in different places what they had learned from John the Baptist, concerning Jesus, the Messiah, the Lamb of God, "the Son of God," and "the Bridegroom" of the church; and, having just before arrived at Ephesus, they had not become acquainted with Aquila and Priscilla. But hearing of Paul, it is probable they introduced themselves to him, as persons who believed in Jesus as the promised Messiah: and, perhaps being regarded as teachers of this doctrine, the apostle might suppose that they had received the Holy Spirit, at the day of Pentecost, or by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; till their answer shewed that they had very imperfect views of the Christian doctrine. He therefore, further enquired, "unto what they had been baptized:" and their answer introduced his remarks, concerning the ministry and baptism of John, as the forerunner and witness to the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, Matt. iii. 11, 12. Luke i. 76—79. iii. 15—20. John i. 6—9. 19—42. iii. 27—36.)

The upper coasts. (1) Τα ανωτερα μέρη. Here only. Ab ανωτερος, superior. The upper parts of Asia Minor, which were more remote from the Mediterranean Sea.

V. 5, 6. Several learned criticks, of different sentiments concerning baptism, have argued that these are the words of Paul, shewing the disciples, that when John baptized those who heard his doctrine, he virtually baptized them in the name of Jesus; and not the words of the historian, relating the baptism of these persons, subsequent to the apostle's instruction of them. Some of those, who first contended for this interpretation, did it out of zeal against such as they called Re-baptizers, lest they should adduce this example in support of their practice. Yet, by maintaining the baptism of John, and the baptism of Christ, to be entirely the same, they have furnished their opponents with a far more plausible argument, than that which they wanted to wrest from them. But, however that may be, I cannot think, that any impartial man, who never heard of these controversies, would, either from reading the original, or our version, put this construction on the words. If John could, in any sense, be said to "baptize his disciples in the name of the Lord Jesus;" Jesus himself must have been baptized virtually in his own name. (Note, John iii. 22—24.) Even St. Paul's question, "Unto what then were ye baptized?" implies a distinction between different kinds of baptism; and denotes, that, while he understood they had been baptized, he also concluded that they had not received Christian baptism, having never heard of the Holy Spirit, in whose name

Christians were baptized. (Note, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 19.)—This is visible even in the words of St. Paul 'here: John said to those that came to his baptism βαπτισθησιν (4), not that they did, but that "they should, believe in him that was coming after him;" now they were not to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, till they did actually believe in him, which they who had received John's baptism were so far from doing, that they were "musing whether John himself were not the "Christ." Whitby. After Christ's ascension no enquiry was made, that we read of, whether the converts had been baptized by John, or not: and if but one of the three thousand, who were baptized on the day of Pentecost, had been John's disciple, (and probably numbers were such,) the baptism of John, and that of Jesus, must have been distinct ordinances. (Note, ii. 41.) The difference between that introductory institution to the Christian dispensation, and the initiatory external seal of that dispensation, has been already considered. (Notes, Matt. iii. 5, 6.)—Some have indeed said, that 'if John's baptism and Christ's were different, our Lord had no communion with the New Testament church in baptism, as he had with the Old Testament church in circumcision.' But "he was made under the law" to fulfil its righteousness, as our Surety; and must therefore, both on that account, and as our example, obey every command, and attend on every institution of God, then in force: whereas, there was not the same reason for his joining in the ordinances of the gospel, which he appointed merely as our Lord and King. Doubtless he ate the passover with his disciples, yet it does not appear that he partook of the eucharist: (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 26—29. Luke xxii. 14—18.) it is not probable that he did; neither can it be supposed, that he was "baptized into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," which is essential to Christian baptism. I apprehend therefore, that these persons, having been further instructed by Paul, were admitted into the church by baptism; previously to the communication of the Holy Spirit to them, by the imposition of the apostle's hands, in his miraculous powers and gifts. (Notes, viii. 14—17. x. 44—48.)

V. 7. 'The opinion of Bishop Stillingfleet is very probable, that St. Paul designed these twelve men for a nursery of the churches in Asia, or persons to be sent from Ephesus to preach among them.' Whitby. Thus these persons continued in the church of Ephesus, waiting for opportunities of acting as evangelists; as the pastors and teachers had before done at Antioch in Syria. (Note, xiii. 1—3.)—The case of these disciples seems to have been, in all respects, the same with that of Apollos, though they were less eminent in the church. (Note, xviii. 24—28.)

Ephesus, which he had done in other places. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, xviii. 18—23.) Many obdurately rejected the gospel, and openly reviled “the way” of seeking acceptance with God, by faith in Jesus: (Marg. Ref. o, p.) so that the apostle deemed it proper to separate the disciples from among them, lest they should perplex or subvert them. And, leaving the opposing Jews, he preached the gospel, and argued in behalf of his doctrine, without intermission, “daily,” in a publick school, before all, both Jews and Gentiles, who would attend him. It is not known whether Jewish divinity, or heathen learning and philosophy, had before been taught in this place: but it is probable, that Tyrannus was converted to Christ, and his school afforded the apostle a commodious place, in which to publish his doctrine; which he did with such success for two years together, that in that time, men of all places and descriptions “in Asia had heard the word of the Lord Jesus.” At the same time he was enabled to work most extraordinary miracles, in confirmation of his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. q—y.—Notes, v. 12—16. John xiv. 7—14.) The handkerchiefs, and aprons (probably such as both men and women, at their work, wore to save their other clothes) could not convey any virtue from the apostle, but were mere tokens of the Lord’s omnipotent operation, as the waving of the rod of Moses had been. No doubt the apostle was enabled to confirm his doctrine by miracles, in other places, even though we have no information about it.—These cures wrought upon absent persons, some of them a considerable distance from Ephesus, might conduce greatly to the success of the gospel among those, whose faces Paul himself had not seen. Doddridge. It may likewise be supposed, that the apostle sent forth some of his assistants, to preach the gospel in the adjaacent cities, while he was labouring at Ephesus; and it is not unlikely that the twelve persons before mentioned were thus employed.—Asia, throughout the Acts of the apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor, or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the consular Asia, but a district in the anterior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest, much ‘as Portugal is from Spain, and of which district Ephesus was the capital.’ Paley.—Two years. (10) The apostle preached three months in the synagogue, and two years in the school of Tyrannus. But in his address to the elders of Ephesus, he mentions three years; (xx. 31;) and most commentators date the beginning of these three years from his first coming to Ephesus. (xviii. 19—21.) Nine months, however, seem far too short a time for his voyage and journey to Jerusalem, and his circuit, by Antioch, and through Galatia and Phrygia, and the upper regions of Asia. The circuit itself could not be made, without travelling perhaps a thousand miles, probably on foot, besides the voyage from Ephesus to Cæsarea; and the stay in each place, in order to answer the intended purposes, must have been considerable. Neither does it appear, how he could say, “Remember, that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one of you night and day with tears;” if he had been absent from them nine months of the time. It is therefore most natural to conclude, that after he had preached two years in the school of Tyrannus, he continued at Ephesus some months longer, before he went into Macedonia.

V. 13—20. (Note, Num. xxii. 5.) It was common in those days for persons to exorcise such as were possessed with evil spirits, especially among the Jews; and, whatever methods they employed, they seem to have, in one way or other, expressed a dependenee on God, and at some times at least to have succeeded. 17 And this was known to ^f all the Jews and Greeks also, dwelling at Ephesus; ^g and fear fell on them all, ^h and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified.

18 And many that believed came,

such exorcisms, and travelled from place to place to carry it on. When they were at Ephesus, the superior efficacy of the name of Jesus in the mouth of Paul, above all their adjurations, determined them to adopt his manner, in hopes of increasing their gain: as if the words had operated in some unaccountable manner, as a charm, in producing the effects, to which the miracles wrought, on the application of the handkerchiefs and aprons from the body of Paul to the diseased and possessed, might give some occasion. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, viii. 9—24.) Thus without regard to the authority, salvation, or honour of Jesus, they attempted to cast out evil spirits, by adjuring them in his name to depart: and seven sons of one man, a chief priest, (probably the head of one of the twenty-four orders of the priests,) combined together in such an attempt. But the evil spirit, by the mouth of the demoniack, answered, that he “knew Jesus, and understood Paul,” when he charged them in the name of Jesus; but who were they? The words are ambiguous; and might imply a confederacy with Jesus and Paul, in consequence of which the evil spirit would have gone out, had Paul thus spoken to him: and Satan might intend to bring the gospel into suspicion by the insinuation. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Matt. xii. 22—30.) Yet they may signify that the evil spirit knew the power and authority of Jesus, and the efficacy of the apostle’s faith, to engage that power by his word; so that if Paul had commanded, he must have yielded. But he knew not then, and would not obey their command. On the contrary, the possessed man, instigated by the evil spirit, assaulted the exorcists with supernatural force and fury, overcame them all, tore off their clothes, and drove them out of the house naked and wounded.—A man must himself be “possessed with a spirit” of incredulity, who can doubt of this having been a real possession, and maintain that this event was merely the effect of insanity. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, xvi. 16—18. Matt. viii. 28, 29.)—This extraordinary transaction was soon known all over Ephesus, both to Jews and Gentiles; and clearly proved, that the effects in the miracles of the apostle, were produced by the power of Christ, and through faith in his name; thus obviating any false conclusions which might have been drawn from the extraordinary nature of them; (Note, iii. 12—16;) and men became afraid to revile or speak contemptuously of the name of Jesus, or to use it for selfish purposes: so that it was in consequence had in great honour. Many, therefore, who had embraced the gospel before, or who were then led to believe it, came and confessed the sins which they had committed, especially in practising magick

and sorcery; and shewed the arts which they had employed. Many also of those, who had been more eminent for these impious and wicked arts, brought the books which treated on such subjects, and which were highly esteemed at Ephesus; and, being determined no more to use them, or to make gain of them, or to throw temptation in the way of others; but rather desirous of expressing their abhorrence of these practices, they publicly burned them. The sum, at which they were valued, upon the lowest computation, amounted to about fifteen hundred pounds: some reckon it to have been almost seven thousand; the one supposing drachmas to be meant, the other shekels of four times the value. (See Tables.) This was a mighty triumph of the gospel over men’s prejudices, favourite pursuits, and love of money; when they were thus at once induced to commit to the flames, books, which might have been sold for so large a sum, lest they should do further mischief to mankind. (Marg. Ref. i—l.)—I think it evident, that these books did not merely contain an account of the tricks, by which jugglers of any description imposed on men’s senses: for in that case, the persons concerned might have used the books, to detect the artifices of such impostors. They contained the rules and forms of those abominable incantations, by which an intercourse with evil spirits has continually been attempted, or conducted. These being in reality the regulations of the worship of the devil, the devised means of worshipping him, and of seeking help and information from him, ought by all means to be destroyed, and forgotten if possible: though the attempt to revive these practices, by publishing books on such subjects, forms one of the bad effects which attend on the manifold advantages of the liberty of the press in this Christian age and nation. V. 21, 22. After these long-continued labours at Ephesus, the apostle purposed to go into Macedonia; either, under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, or in the zeal and fervency of his own spiritual mind: but as he did not exactly accomplish his plan, according to the manner which he intended, some prefer the latter interpretation.—He, however, designed to sail westward into Macedonia; and, having visited the churches there and in Achaia, to go south-east as far as Jerusalem: and afterwards to return to the north-west, further than he had ever before been, that he might preach the gospel at Rome also. (Marg. Ref. p—r.) Thus he had laid the plan of his voyages and journeys, backward and forward, of some thousands of miles, as if it had been no more than a progress through a single province!—One part of his design, was to collect money in the different churches which he had planted, and to carry it to Jerusalem for the relief of the poor Christians there. For this purpose he sent before him Timothy, and Erastus, who had been the chamberlain of Corinth, (Rom. xvi. 23,) to prepare the minds of the Thessalonians, Philippians, Bereans, and Corinthians; but he continued some time longer at Ephesus, before he went into Macedonia. (xxiv. 17. Notes, Rom. xv. 22—29. 1 Cor. xvi. 1—12. 2 Cor. viii. ix.)

Purposed in the spirit. (21) Εθετο εν τω πνευματι. xx. 22. It does not appear, that πνευμα with the article, and without the possessive pronoun, or something to fix the application of it, is used in the New Testament, except for the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, xx. 22—24.)

V. 23—31. In this interim an alarming and perilous disturbance was excited "about that way" of worshipping the God of Israel. (Marg. Ref. y.) Demetrius, a principal silversmith, carried on a large trade for silver models of the renowned temple of Diana at Ephesus, with a little image in each of them; which were in great request, both as curious and beautiful ornaments, and for idolatrous purposes; and in this manufacture he employed a great number of workmen, highly to their emolument, as well as his own. Having therefore convened them, and all others whose occupations were connected with the support of the popular and prevalent idolatry: he reminded them, that they got their wealth by making these silver shrines, or temples, and similar articles of commerce: and he then shewed them, that Paul's preaching was likely to disgrace and ruin their trade, by persuading the Ephesians and all the Asiatics, "that they were no gods, which were made "with hands:" a most heretical tenet, in the judgment of those who grew rich by manufacturing deities! (Marg. Ref. z—d.—Notes, Is. xli. 5—7. xlv. 9—20. Jer. x. 3—16. Hos. viii. 5, 6.) So that, not only were they likely to be impoverished, and the workmen to be deprived of employment and means of subsistence, the business itself falling into disgrace; but their religion likewise was at stake, (about which, in subserviency to his lucre, Demetrius would be thought very zealous,) and the splendid temple and magnificent apparatus, with which the great goddess Diana was worshipped, by persons from all parts of the world, were likely to sink into contempt and neglect, to the great injury of their renowned city.—This address

32 Some therefore 'cried one thing, and some another; for the assembly was confused, 'and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together.

33 And they drew 'Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander "beckoned with the hand, and would have made 'his defence unto the people.

34 But when 'they knew that he was a Jew, 'all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried out, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

35 And when the town-clerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not, how that the city of the Ephesians is * a worshipper of the great goddess Diana, ^b and of the image which fell down from ^c Jupiter :

36 Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ^d ye ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly.

37 For ye have brought hither these men, ^e which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess.

38 Wherefore if 'Demetrius and the craftsmen which are with him, ^f have a matter against any man, ^g the law is open, and there are deputies; let them implead one another.

39 But if ye enquire any thing con-

to the interest, idolatry, pride, and resentment of the company, was calculated to inflame their passions. Accordingly, in most furious indignation against Paul and the Christians, and with immense zeal for their lucrative religion, they began to exclaim as with one voice, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." This soon brought a mob together, and threw the whole city into an uproar: and as Paul was not met with, the ringleaders of the riot seized upon two of his companions in his travels; and rushed with them into the theatre, where the publick games are supposed to have been then celebrating; probably intending to throw them to the wild beasts, with which slaves and condemned malefactors used to fight, for the cruel diversion of the spectators. (Marg. Ref. f—m.) When the apostle understood this, he was desirous of entering into the theatre, to speak to the people; being willing to venture himself, in hopes of preserving his friends: but the disciples, knowing that the enraged mob would not scruple to tear him in pieces, interposed to hinder him. Indeed, some of the Asiarchs, or officers appointed from the different cities of Asia, to superintend the publick games, being friendly to him, sent to intreat that he would not thus expose himself, as they could by no means undertake to protect him. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—No gods, &c. (26) 'This plainly shews that the contrary opinion 'generally prevailed, namely, that there was a kind of divinity in the images of their supposed deities, ... though 'some of them ... learned to speak of them just as the 'papists now do; who indeed may seem to have borrowed 'some of their apologies from the heathens.' Doddridge.—The vulgar, both among pagans and papists, always have supposed, that there is some kind of divinity in the image; but the more learned and philosophical palliate the absurdity, by considering the image as the visible representation of the invisible deity or saint. It might also be easily shewn, that the processions, and very many other observances of the papists, are copied from pagan customs; and far more clear illustrations of these pompous ceremonies may be made from Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, and other classical writers, than from the holy scriptures, or even the Apocrypha.

V. 32—41. As Paul did not appear among the people, and the ringleaders of the tumult could not make the multitude generally acquainted with their intentions; some cried one thing and some another: and, as it is usual on such occasions, the greater number of them knew not the cause, for which the tumult had been excited. At length, one Alexander was singled out from the multitude, who made signs with his hand, that he wanted to speak in his own behalf before them. Many think that this was Alexander the coppersmith, who afterwards became an apostate from Christianity; but this is uncertain. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Note, 2 Tim. iv. 14, 15.) It is not agreed, whether he was a convert to Christianity, or an unbelieving Jew: some think that he desired to declaim against the gospel, and thus to avert the odium from the Jews; and that the Jews put him forward for this purpose, thus joining with the idolaters, though it tended to undermine their own cause: others conclude, that, being seized on, he meant to plead for Christianity and against idolatry, and that the Jews were desirous of his being heard, from an apprehension that this tumult was excited against them, as well as against the Christians. The multitude, however, would not hear him, because they knew him to be a Jew, and an enemy to their idolatry; but, in contempt of all the worshippers of JΕΗΟΥΑΗ, and in order to magnify their favourite idol, they with one consent most vociferously cried out, for two hours together, "Great is the Ephesian Diana." (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Note, 1 Kings xviii. 26—29.) Having spent their rage, and wearied themselves in this senseless manner, they were thus kept from greater outrages: till at length the Town-clerk, or Scribe, some magistrate of great authority, was enabled to appease the tumult; after which he spoke to the people with consummate address and ingenuity. He seemed to allow the truth and importance of their absurd traditions and idolatries; though it may be doubted, whether he really believed a word of them. He observed, that it was universally allowed, that their city thought it her chief honour, to support the temple and worship of Diana, and to preserve the image of her, which immemorial tradition declared to have fallen down from Jupiter: and was not therefore "made with hands." As these things were undeniable, they ought to behave more quietly and cautiously. They had indeed apprehended two men, and were about to wreak their vengeance upon them: yet they had neither sacrilegiously robbed the temple of Diana, nor the temples of any other of their deities; nor had they uttered any blasphemies against their goddess. The apostle was not present, yet doubtless he too was meant: but, while his doctrine undermined the foundations of idolatry, we may suppose, that he never went out of his way to rail at any particular idol.—The town-clerk, or scribe, proceeded to shew, that if any persons were injured in their property, or business; they might bring the matter before the proconsuls, in a regular course of law, and thus obtain satisfaction. But, if the complaint related to matters of religion, or other publick interests; they ought to be decided in a regular meeting of the citizens, or in the accustomed manner, and not before the populace. So that, in fact, the law had been violated that day, by these riotous proceedings; and the city and magistrates were liable to be called into question by the Romans for it; as they could assign no sufficient cause for the insurrection. By this politick harangue, the multitude were prevailed with to disperse; and Paul and his friends were preserved from the most imminent danger.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

We do not at present expect miraculous powers to be conferred on us by the Holy Ghost: yet all, who profess themselves to be the disciples of Christ, should be called upon to examine, whether they have received "the seal of the Holy Spirit," in his sanctifying influences, to the sincerity of their faith. (Notes, Rom. viii. 14—17. 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. Eph. i. 13, 14. iv. 30—32.) Alas! many seem not to have "heard, that there is a Holy Ghost!" and many regard all that is spoken concerning his graces and consolations, to be enthusiasm and delusion! But it may properly be enquired of them, "Unto what then were ye baptized?" For they evidently know not the meaning of that external sign, on which they place so great dependence. Where, however, men are conscientious and teachable, they will receive increasing light: repentance and its genuine fruits prepare the heart for the comforts and blessings of faith in Christ, and for the witness and earnest of the Holy Spirit: and we should not "despise the day of small things."—When convincing arguments, and affectionate persuasions, only harden men in unbelief, and excite them to blasphemy; we must "separate ourselves," and such as we can influence, from their contagious company; and we should endeavour to find out more teachable persons, to whom we may communicate the glad tidings of salvation.—The power, which attends the word of the Lord Jesus, will eventually distinguish it from other doctrines: he uses divers instruments and means, in exerting his power; but the work of healing our souls, or pulling down the kingdom of Satan, is wholly his own.

V. 13—20.

The enemy of souls does not greatly regard those, who use the name of Jesus, without faith or love, for the sake of their temporal interest or reputation. He and his as-

Paul and his friends go into Macedonia and Greece, and return to Troas, 1—6; where, as Paul preaches long, Eutychus falls from a window, and is taken up dead: but he is restored to life; and the apostles and disciples break bread, and converse till day-break, 7—12. Paul and his friends sail to Miletus, 13—16.

He sends for the elders of Ephesus, 17. He states to them his ministry, conduct, and prospects; exhorting, warning, and instructing them with great fervency, and faithful love, and “commending them to God and “the word of his grace,” 18—35. He prays with them; and takes a most affectionate farewell, leaving them in great sorrow, because they should see his face no more, 36—38.

sociates know the work of the divine Saviour, and the efficacy of his word in the mouth of his faithful servants; but they despise hireling preachers, and hypocritical professors of the gospel, whom they will overcome to their destruction. But all the efforts of the devil and his servants, to disgrace or oppose the cause of Christ, eventually redound to its honour, and to the credit of his faithful ministers.—The name of Jesus is magnified, when deceivers are detected and disgraced; when sinners are brought to confess and forsake their evil deeds; when they renounce their curious arts, and iniquitous or impious gains, in obedience to the gospel; and when they make expensive sacrifices to the truth, in the presence of all men.—It would by no means be proper, that all books which have no relation to matters of religion, or are not altogether favourable to it, should be destroyed: but surely such as are indecent and licentious, scornfully infidel, or heretical in essential matters, would be condemned to the flames, if “the word of God grew mightily and prevailed” among us; not indeed by the sentence of the inquisitor, but by the voluntary choice of the possessors. Men would, in that case, neither read such books themselves, nor keep them in their houses, to poison the principles and morals of their children or dependents; nor sell them to contaminate the minds and murder the souls of others. Were all such books destroyed in this kingdom, their price would be found immensely more than “fifty thousand pieces of silver!” Will not then these Ephesian converts rise up in judgment against such professors of the gospel especially, as trade in pernicious books and pamphlets; and who encourage such publications for lucre’s sake, as they must know are likely to do great mischief in the world? And is it not a proof, that the word of God declines in its influence and authority, when books pretending to teach, and persons professing to exercise, forbidden and curious and magical arts, are publicly advertised among us? But let no friend of the gospel countenance any pretensions of this kind; whether they be human impositions, or diabolical delusions.

V. 21—31.

The enterprising spirit and unwearied diligence of conquerors, navigators, and others, are generally admired: but the same endowments, when directed by love to Christ and to the souls of men, commonly meet with neglect, if not ridicule and contempt! Yet surely our apostle “laboured more abundantly, than all” the admired heroes of the world, or those who explore undiscovered regions; as well as more than any other preacher of the gospel: and happy and honourable are all they, who have been influenced by the same motives, to tread in some good measure in his steps. But when they are most active and successful, they may assure themselves of most opposition from the worshippers of mammon, and the bigots of idolatry and superstition. Indeed the distinct principles of avarice and superstition naturally coalesce: nor would idolatry, delusion, or vice, though congenial to the human heart, meet with so firm and general a support, did they not conduce to the temporal advantage of numbers, who grow rich by them. Abuses in ecclesiastical systems, absurdities in creeds, and superstitions in religious worship, will be sure to engage many zealous supporters; while they encourage the elegant arts, with manufactures and commerce, and bring no small gain to the craftsmen and to other parties concerned. The immense encouragement which Popery has always given to painting, sculpture, musick, architecture, and other ingenious arts, attaches great multitudes to its splendid forms; and greatly impedes all attempts for reformation. “Sirs, ye know, that by this craft “we have our wealth,” is often the private argument of men one among another: while the honour of the great Diana, or of the system, the church, or sect, is the ostensible pretence. Nay, the devotees of mammon and superstition not only impose on others, but on themselves; and imagine that they really love their religion, while they only value the affluence and splendour and honour, derived from it! Their selfishness increases their bigotry; and their interested opposition to the gospel clokes its malignity under zeal for some forms or observances: their indignation and resentment and envy are expressed in furious zeal for the honour of their idol; and the servants of God are hated and persecuted, because they draw men off from those sins, by which lucrative trades are supported. Such persons would “eat up the sin of the people, and set their “hearts upon their iniquities;” whilst they vehemently contend “for the vain conversation delivered by tradition “from their fathers.” (Notes, xvi. 16—24. Hos. iv. 7—11. 1 Pet. i. 17—21. Rev. xviii. 11—19. P. O. 9—19.) Ecclesiastical history continually furnishes the student with instances of these combinations: and we can scarcely look around us in the world, but we see the part of Demetrius and the workmen, acted over and over again, even to the filling of cities with tumult and confusion. It is as safe to contend with wild beasts, as with men who are thus enraged by bigotry and disappointed avarice; or who think that all arguments are answered, when they have shewn that they grow rich by those measures which the ministers of truth, and the friends of genuine reformation oppose: and whatever side in religious controversies, or whatever name this spirit assumes; it is antichristian, and should be strenuously discountenanced by all the friends of truth and piety.—Zeal for the honour of Christ, and love to the brethren, will induce consistent believers to venture into any danger, where these are concerned: but those who value the lives of useful persons may sometimes properly interpose to moderate their zeal: and friends will often be raised up to them, from those who are strangers to vital religion, but have observed their integrity and consistent behaviour.

V. 32-41.

A confused mob can never effect any thing, but mischief and madness. Like a wild beast, it sometimes turns against and destroys those, who meant to govern its operations, or to derive advantage from them: and generally the greater part of riotous multitudes know not for what purposes they are come together. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 8-11.) It is well, when their fury evaporates in senseless clamour; for it is commonly most cruel and destructive. Yet he, who "ruleth the waves of the sea," can also "still the madness of the people:" and in him we should trust ourselves and all belonging to us, when perils alarm us.—Worldly policy and sagacity often abound, where piety is utterly wanting: and prudent worldly men, by eajoling the deluded multitudes in their follies and absurdities, prevail far more with them, than the most eminent servants of God possibly could by truth and argument. What senseless fables have they implicitly credited, who would not believe the report of the gospel! And how ridiculous have they often been, in their religious opinions and worship, who have discovered the most consummate good sense upon every other subject! For "the god of this world blinds the minds" of unbelievers. Let us, however, be thankful for prudent magistrates, who can by any means keep the peace, and afford us protection, while we quietly worship God according to our consciences, and endeavour to promote the knowledge of his great salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1-6. The apostle probably concluded, that it would be imprudent for him to continue at Ephesus, lest some other insurrection should be excited on his account: he therefore, not long after, affectionately took leave of the disciples in that city, and set out to travel into Macedonia. He went through Troas, and had then a favourable opportunity of preaching the gospel: but not meeting Titus, whom he expected from Corinth, he was so desirous of visiting that city, that he proceeded on his journey without further delay. (Marg. Ref. b-d.—Note, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13.) The first epistle to the Corinthians seems to have been written before he left Ephesus; (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 31-34;) and the second, when he was in Macedonia on his progress to Achaia, which probably took up more time than he had expected. (Prefaces to the first and second epistles to the Corinthians.) In the several churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, he exhorted, instructed, and encouraged the disciples very copiously, concerning all things relating to their faith and practice, and the management of the common concerns of each church. (Marg. Ref. e.) He was especially employed also, in making collections for the poor Jewish converts at Jerusalem. (Note, xix. 21, 22.) When he had thus passed through Macedonia, he came into Greece, where he spent three months, at Corinth and the adjacent places: and being then about to sail into Syria, he understood, that some Jews had formed a conspiracy to meet him by the way, either to rob him of the money which he had collected, or to murder him: he therefore returned through Macedonia, and revisited the churches in that region.—The persons here mentioned seem to have been the messengers appointed by the several churches, to accompany him with their contributions to Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. i-q.—Note, 2 Cor. viii. 16-24.) Timothy had gone before the apostle into Macedonia; we find him here attending on him, and he was with him when he wrote the second epistle to the Corinthians: (Note, 2 Cor. i. 1-7, v. 1.) yet elsewhere he says, that he desired him to tarry at Ephesus, when he went into Macedonia. (1 Tim. i. 3, 4.) It is probable, that the first epistle to Timothy was written, when the apostle was in Macedonia, soon after he left Ephesus: so that we must conclude that Timothy returned thither before Paul came away; and that he staid there only a short time, before he, on some account, came to Paul in Macedonia. But he might return thither, and take up his stated residence there afterwards, for some time, according to the statement of ecclesiastical writers.—The historian here again speaks in the first person plural, whence we may conclude, that he had now rejoined the company: and he continued with St. Paul, while some of the others went before to Troas, where a Christian church had before been founded; and thither after a short time the apostle followed them. (Marg. Ref. s-x.)

V. 7—12. It is not said, that the disciples were called together, as on a special occasion; but that they came together, as it seems according to their general practice. Hence it is evident, that Christians were accustomed to assemble for religious worship, “on the first day of the week;” but the change, from the seventh to the first, appears to have been gradually and silently introduced, by example rather than by express precept. (Marg. Ref. y.—Note, John xx. 19—23.) Their principal time of assembling appears to have been in the evening: either for fear of enemies; or because many servants in heathen families, and other poor persons, could not obtain liberty of meeting them at an earlier hour.—“Breaking of bread,” or commemorating the death of Christ in the eucharist, was one chief end of their assembling. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) This ordinance seems to have been constantly administered every Lord’s day: and probably no professed Christians absented themselves, after they had been admitted into the church; unless they lay under some censure, or had some real hindrance. It may be gathered from the narrative, that the apostle hastening to Jerusalem, spending seven days at Troas, and departing the next morning, staid on purpose to spend one Lord’s day with them: and, preaching to them on this occasion, as he had seldom spoken to them before, and being about to leave them, not knowing that he should ever see them again, his fervent affection led him to continue his discourse even till midnight. (Marg. Ref. b.) His audience no doubt in general attended to his exhortations with eagerness and delight; but one young man was overcome with sleep, and, falling from the third story, was taken up dead. He had, probably, been previously wearied with labour; and perhaps was not duly attentive to the important topics, on which the apostle was discoursing.—The enemies of the Christians accused them, of holding nocturnal meetings in the dark; but the sacred historian informs us, that there were many lights in the room. And as it was most likely very much crowded, the windows seem to have been open to admit the air.—The fall of Eutychus interrupted the religious exercises of the company, and excited in them much sorrow and anxiety: Paul, however, went down, and, embracing the body, exhorted them not to disquiet themselves, for his life was in him. It is probable that Eutychus had been dead: but the apostle was assured of his restoration to life, which perhaps took place at the moment when he spoke; and he afterwards gradually recovered health and strength. (Marg. Ref. c—h.) Accordingly, the company returned to their sacred services: and, after the Lord’s supper had been celebrated, and the company had taken some refreshment; the apostle, instead of apologizing for the length of his discourse, resumed the subject, and continued to converse with them till the day dawned, and it was time for him and his friends to set out on their journey. At this time the young man was brought among them alive and well; so that the whole concurred in giving them no ordinary degree of encouragement and consolation. (Marg. Ref. i—m.)—We may easily conceive how many things would be said at Troas, about a night spent altogether in preaching, religious conversation, and devotion: and had Eutychus lost his life, it would have given the enemies of the gospel some plausible ground for exclaiming against unseasonable hours, long sermons, and enthusiastical irregularities.

V. 13—16. Assos, Trogyllium, and Miletus were cities of Asia, on the sea-coast: Mitylene was a city in the Isle of Lesbos, which, with Chios and Samos, was situated near the Coast of Asia, in what is now called the Archipelago. Paul chose “to go afoot” from Troas to Assos; probably for the sake of retirement and private devotion, as his public work left him little time to be alone. But he might also intend to call on some friends, or transact some business, unknown to us. When he had joined his company, he determined not to stop at Ephesus, as he knew that he should not easily get away from his beloved people there; and therefore they sailed past Ephesus to Miletus, a city about thirty miles further to the south.—The apostle seems to have had the direction of the vessel, which he could not have had, if merely a passenger: it is therefore probable that it belonged to some of his friends.—His purpose was, to make what haste he could to Jerusalem, that he might spend the feast of Pentecost there: (Marg. Ref. o—q:) perhaps hoping for some opportunity of usefulness among the Jews and proselytes who came to the feast, or of softening their prejudices against him: especially he might deem this the best time for dispensing the contributions which he carried, in such a manner as to promote the friendly communion between the Jewish and Gentile converts.—The historian continues to speak in language which shews that he was one of the company.

V. 17. The apostle could not, with propriety, visit Ephesus: but he desired to give some further instructions and admonitions to “the elders of the church,” which he had there planted; and accordingly he sent for them to come to him at Miletus.—The same persons are in this chapter called “elders” or presbyters, and “overseers” or bishops; (28. Gr.) it must therefore be allowed, that these were not distinct orders of ministers in the church at that time. Probably, when the apostles founded a church they appointed pastors over it; according to the numbers to be superintended, or the field of usefulness which was opened in the neighbourhood: these were at first called either “elders,” or “overseers,” that is, presbyters, or bishops, indifferently; and no one had any direct authority over the rest. By degrees the number of converts would increase, other churches would be planted in the neighbourhood, and more pastors chosen. In the mean time the senior ministers, and such as were most eminent for wisdom, ability, piety, or usefulness, would acquire a measure of influence and authority: and their juniors, both in their own church, and in others which had been planted from it, would naturally look up to them. Thus they would be expected to take the lead in every business: especially in the ordination of ministers, in directing their labours, and in animadverting on such as turned aside to heretical doctrines, or immoral practices. Hence the name of “Bishop,” or Overseer or Inspector, seems gradually to have been appropriated to one principal minister, to whom a measure of authority and distinction was insensibly annexed; and the title and rank of “Presbyters” were continued to the rest. (Note, xi. 27—30.) It is evident that episcopacy prevailed, generally and early, in the primitive church; and it seems to have been gradually introduced. There were many elders in the church at Ephesus at this time; yet Christ afterwards addressed his epistle “to the angel of the church of Ephesus;” which seems to mean the superintending pastor, who was an inspector over the elders. (Note, Rev. ii. 1.) It appears, to me at least, that neither episcopacy, nor any other species of church-government, can be proved from scripture, to be exclusively of divine authority. But a moderate episcopacy has many and great advantages to recommend it: and the high claims and excessive authority, which soon began to be advanced and exercised by bishops and lordly prelates, of different titles; and all the abuses of antichristian tyranny, supply the best arguments to those, who would entirely exclude that order from the church. In this, however, as well as in other things, very much remains to be remedied and rectified, among every description of Christians, before matters can be reduced to the scriptural standard.—Every impartial man must allow, that if Timothy had been at this time bishop of Ephesus, in that sense for which some contend; the apostle would have given these elders some exhortation, to pay a proper deference to his episcopal authority.—To assert, as some have done, (Dr. Hammond especially,) that these elders of Ephesus were indeed the diocesan bishops of all the Asiatic churches, only exposes the cause which it is meant to support: for, besides the inexcusable liberty taken with the words of scripture; how could these bishops have been got together, at so short a notice? Unless it be supposed, that they all resided at Ephesus, and left the charge of their dioeceses to others, according to the too common custom of later times! The statement would also shew, that there were no presbyters; and consequently a parity of ministers, in the primitive church, directly contrary to the sentiments of those who make it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 1. v. 19, 20.)

V. 18—21. ‘Paul, a diligent imitator of Christ, hastening to bonds by a continued course, first as it were makes his will; in which he gives some account of his manner of life, defends the doctrine which he had taught, and exhorts the pastors of the church to perseverance.’ Beza.—The apostle first called the attention of these elders, to the methods which he had pursued, and the conduct which he had manifested, among them, since his first coming into Asia; that is, the district so called, of which Ephesus was the capital. (Note, xix. 8—12.) He had, at all seasons, however circumstanced, devoted himself to the service and worship of the Lord, in a humble, gentle, unassuming, and self-abasing manner: without aspiring at the honour which came from man, or being ambitious of distinction or authority. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, Matt. xviii. 1—4. xx. 24—28. 1 Thes. ii. 1—8. 1 Pet. v. 1—4.) His services had been attended with many tears of fervent affection, and with great sorrow of heart; on account of the obstinate unbelief of the Jews, the blind idolatry of the Gentiles, the afflictions, temptations, and misconduct of the Christians, and his own manifold infirmities. He had also encountered many hardships, and been exposed to many perils, from the insidious malice of the Jews and the conspiracies which they laid against him: these were a great trial to him, and might have tempted him to decline the service, or to be unfaithful in his ministry. Yet the elders knew, that he had not “shunned,” from any motive, to give them, not only instructions, true as far as they went, but all such counsels, warnings, and encouragements, as could conduce to their spiritual advantage; this he had simply consulted without greatly regarding, whether they or others were pleased or displeased with him. What he had taught publickly, he had also discoursed of privately; going “from house to house,” among the converts and such as were willing to receive him, to admonish, counsel, and instruct, every one in particular, as his ease required. (Marg. Ref. y—e.) He had, especially, with the utmost earnestness, insisted upon the absolute necessity of repentance towards God, the great Creator and Governor of the world, whose holy laws all had broken, and whose righteous displeasure they had incurred; before whom they ought therefore to humble themselves with godly sorrow, confessing their sins, and shewing their sincerity by works meet for repentance. With this he had connected his unwavering testimony, to the necessity of “faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ;” or a belief of those divine testimonies, which relate to his Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation; and a reliance on him, as the divine Surety and Saviour of sinners, for all the blessings of salvation.—This repentance and faith, when considered in connexion with man’s need of them, the source from which they spring, and the invariable effects of them, on the heart and life of him, who continually exercises them; may be considered as the substance of Christianity, the religion of a sinner under a dispensation of mercy and grace. Ref. i—l.) This, however, did not in the least deter him from the service which he had undertaken, or so discompose his mind, as to unfit him for his important duties: because “he made no account of these things;” indeed he did not value life, for his own sake; having no desire to live, except the glory of God and the benefit of the church required it. (Notes, Phil. i. 19—26.) For his grand object was, to finish his Christian race, with joyful assurance of meeting the approbation of his Lord, and of receiving “the prize of his high calling;” and, in order to this, to execute faithfully, till death, the important ministry which the Lord Jesus had committed to him; and to testify to sinners of every nation, the glad tidings of the abundant mercy and grace of God, for the complete

V. 25—27. An immediate revelation seems to have been, about this time, made to the apostle, that he should no more revisit Ephesus, or see any of these elders, or those in that neighbourhood to whom he had preached, any more on earth. This made him the more earnest in his exhortations and admonitions ; and he therefore, testified to them, and called on them to bear witness for him, that he was guiltless of the blood (that is, of the eternal ruin) of those, who might perish among them or their flocks : as he had not declined, either from fear, or desire of their applause, or friendship, to “declare unto them the whole “counsel of God,” respecting the way of salvation by Christ for all true believers, and the certain destruction of all who neglect so great salvation ; and respecting all things pertaining to the doctrine, practice, and discipline of the church.
(Marg. Ref.—Notes, 18—21. xviii. 1—6. Ez. iii. 17—19. xxxiii. 2—9.) As he had been wholly preserved from ignorance or mistake, about the truth and will of God, in these things ; so he had been kept from all unfaithfulness in respect of them.—‘Hence we learn, that it is necessary ‘for a pastor, to declare to his people all, that is necessary
‘for them to believe and do, in order to salvation, in order ‘that the guilt of their ruin may not lie upon him.’ Whitby.
It is probable, that the apostle went, after this, into the neighbourhood of Ephesus : (Note, 2 Tim. iv. 9—13, v.
12. Philem. 22—25 :) and, on this ground, some learned men think, that in saying, “I know that ye all...shall see “my face no more ;” he only meant to draw this conclusion from the predictions, which were given of the sufferings that awaited him. The elders, however, understood him, as speaking with certainty of what he knew by revelation : nor did he attempt to undeceive them, though he saw them overwhelmed with grief. (Note, 36—38. Preface

V. 28. In imitation of the example which he had set them, and in expectation of that great and awful account which they must give of their ministry, the apostle next warned the elders “to take heed to themselves,” to their state, spirit, conduct, and doctrine ; and to all the flock, over which the “Holy Ghost had made them overseers.”
(Note, 1 Tim. iv. 11—16.) Their qualifications for the ministry had been derived from the Divine Spirit ; he had disposed them to undertake that service ; he had directed those who selected and ordained them ; and he had confirmed that appointment by his gifts and endowments.
(Marg. Ref. b—d.—Note, 1 Cor. xii. 4—11, v. 11.)—Some think, that the twelve men before spoken of were especially intended, and that the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of Paul, was referred to. (Note, xix.
7.)—The great end of the pastoral office to which they were appointed was, that they might “feed the church of God, “which he had purchased with his own blood :” that they might continually dispense those pure and wholesome truths, which are the proper nutriment of the soul : and which, when regenerated, it desires, relishes, feeds on,
and grows by, in knowledge, faith, hope, and holiness.
The conversion of sinners, as part of this chosen flock, is implied in this commission. (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, John xxi. 15—17. Eph. iv. 11—13. 1 Pet. ii. 1—3. v. 1—4.)—The most able critics have shewn, that the present is the genuine reading of the verse ; though a few copies have “the church of the Lord,” a phrase not used in the New Testament. The passage is a most decisive testimony to the deity of Christ. The atonement and ransom of our souls, is the blood of Jesus, who is as truly God, as man : and thus in his mysterious Person, as God and man, he “purchased the church with his own blood.”
This gave the infinite value to his sacrifice ; and it suggests to his ministers the most powerful motives to faithfulness, diligence, patience, and fortitude in their work.—The personality and deity, and sovereignty likewise, of the Holy

V. 29—31. To enforce these things still more, the apostle assured his brethren, the pastors of the flock, that he certainly knew, by the Spirit of prophecy, that after he was gone from them, grievous, strong, and cruel wolves would break into the fold, and devour the sheep: these may either mean seducing teachers from other countries, intruding among them and usurping authority, so as to fleece, scatter, or oppress the flock, for the gratification of their own avarice or ambition: or cruel persecutors, by whom many believers were put to death, and many professed Christians were tempted to apostatize. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Ez. xxxiv. 2—6. Matt. vii. 15—20.) Besides these, others would spring up from "among themselves," devising and propagating heretical doctrines; corrupting the purity of the faith; disturbing the harmony of the church; drawing off the people from their faithful pastors on various pretences; attaching many to themselves as their disciples; and thus forming scandalous sects and schisms. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, 1 Tim. i. 18—20. 2 Tim. i. 15. ii. 14—18. 2 Pet. ii. 1—3. Rev. ii. 6, 7.) As "the enemy sows these tares in the field," while men sleep; (Notes, Is. lvi. 9—12. Matt. xiii. 24—30. 36—43;) Paul exhorted the elders on this account to watch, and be vigilant to observe and check the first appearance of all these evils: remembering that for three years together he had constantly warned them, one by one, by night as well as by day; bereaving himself of rest and refreshment, that he might seize on every opportunity for these admonitions; and that his earnest affection for their souls, joined with his foresight of these perversions, had caused him to mingle his warnings with many tears. V. 32—35. Having endeavoured to impress these pastors with a deep sense of the arduousness and importance of their work, the apostle concluded by "commending them to God;" earnestly calling on them to rely wholly on his guidance, assistance, protection, and blessing; and calling on God to take their souls, and those of the flock, into his almighty and gracious keeping. He also commended them to the "word of his grace," as the ground of their hope, rule of their conduct, and the source of their consolation; seeing that the Lord was able, according to his word, to build them up in faith and holiness, amidst all the temptations, trials, and delusions, to which they might be exposed; and at length to "give them an inheritance" in heaven, among all those whom he had set apart for himself, and made meet by his sanctifying Spirit for that holy felicity. (Marg. Ref. s—y.—Note, xxvi. 16—18.) There he expected again to meet them, as "kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation." (Notes, 1 Pet. i. 3—5. Jude 22—25.)—He could appeal to them, that he had acted disinterestedly among them: though many of the Ephesians were rich, yet "he had not coveted," or in any way sought for, any man's wealth, or secular advantages: nay, he had not accepted of that maintenance, to which he was fairly entitled; but had laboured at a manual employment to maintain himself and his fellow-labourers. (Notes, 1 Cor. ix. 4—12.) Thus he had shewed them, by his example, the tendency of his doctrine; that from him they (even the "presbyters," or "bishops,") might learn, that it was their duty to labour, after the same manner, in order to maintain themselves, and to contribute to the support of their poor brethren, when weak and sick, or otherwise unable to maintain themselves. (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Notes, 1 Thes. v. 12—15. 2 Thes. iii. 6—9.) They ought also to remember the words, which the Lord Jesus had commonly used, as an important aphorism, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." It is more happy to be able to give, than to be obliged to receive; and therefore better to labour and be frugal, than to indulge sloth and expense: there is more comfort and pleasure in giving than in receiving; there is more of grace, of love, of heaven, and of the divine image, in giving, than in receiving. This traditional speech, so suited to the character of him, "who, being rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich," would not have been preserved for our use, if it had not thus been committed to writing. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, 2 Cor. viii. 6—9.)—With this example, instruction, and admonition to labour, disinterestedness, and liberality, the apostle closed his address to these elders; and his words could not but make a deep and durable impression on their pious minds.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Tumults and opposition may constrain a Christian or minister to remove from his station, or to alter his purpose: but his employment and pleasure will be the same wherever he goes.—Even believers need "much exhortation," to render them habitually stedfast, zealous, prudent, and persevering in every good work, and to animate faith and prayer to be enabled to do this.—Christians should always delight in commemorating their Lord's death at his table, and his resurrection by observing his holy day: but the general contempt and profanation of the Christian sabbath by the professed disciples of Jesus, and the withdrawing of so great a majority of the congregation, even where the gospel is preached, when the Lord's supper is about to be administered, evince the low state of vital religion among us, and tend to reduce it still lower.—It shews a carnal state of mind, when people are soon wearied in the worship of God, and are in haste to close it, for the sake of animal recreation, or vain conversation. Doubtless it is inexpedient, on ordinary occasions, to lengthen out religious ordinances much beyond the usual time: yet surely Paul would be displeased, surprised, or grieved, to hear the professors of his doctrine complain of an instructive sermon, because it was an hour long; or of the length of the service, when it scarcely exceeded two hours!—If we cannot wholly excuse Eutychus, for yielding to sleep at midnight, during the apostle's copious exhortations; how inexcusable are they, who in the middle of the day, and during a service of a moderate length, make a practice of sleeping, as if best pleased when most composed to rest! Infirmary or weariness, indeed, requires tenderness: but such an indulged habit of contempt should be treated with decided severity. They who thus offend have cause to tremble, lest some sudden judgment should cut them off in their sin, and leave them to perish without remedy: and such as desire to get the better of this temptation should join earnest prayers, with all other methods of keeping themselves awake; for when this is neglected, they need not wonder that they are unsuccessful.—Should a company of believers among us, on some remarkable occasion, spend a whole night in the exercises of religion, what exclamations, revilings, and derision would it excite! Yet little is said, when the devotees of festive indulgence, fashionable dissipation, or more vulgar revels, employ their nights in the most irregular manner: as if time spent in devotion broke in upon the order of families, or the peace of society, far more than when dedicated to vain amusement, or bacchanalian riot! Or as if more earnestness were allowable in any thing else, than in the service of God!—Nay, many of us, who now count religion our chief joy, can remember a time, when we entrenched upon the hours of rest, for our frolics and pleasures, with far less reluctance, than we now should for the purpose of secret or social worship. So hard is it for spirituality to flourish in the heart of a fallen creature, under any culture! and so naturally and spontaneously do carnal affections grow and thrive there!—The Lord, however, will take care of the concerns, and pardon the infirmities, of his people: and he will comfort them under all their tribulations, even when called to separate from those, whom they have most loved.

V. 13—21.

No Christian can be comfortable or prosperous, without retirement. Popular ministers may preach, converse, or pray in company, to the edifying of others: and yet de-

CHAP. XXI.

Paul and his friends leave Miletus, and arrive at Tyre; where, finding disciples, they stay seven days, and part from them with prayer, kneeling down on the sea-shore, 1—6. They proceed to Cæsarea, to the house of Philip the evangelist, whose four daughters prophesy, 7—9. Agabus foretels that Paul will be bound at Jerusalem: he is not however dissuaded from going thither, 10—16. Arriving at Jerusalem, he reports, to James and the elders, the success of his labours among the Gentiles, 17—19. He is persuaded to purify himself at the temple, with four men who had a vow, 20—26; where he is set upon by some Jews from Asia, and in danger of being slain in a tumult, but is rescued by the chief captain; who binds him with chains, and leads him to the castle, 27—36. He requests, and is permitted, to speak to the people, 37—40.

cline in their own souls, for want of self-examination, humiliation, and secret prayer, suited immediately to their own case: nay, the most able preachers will generally cease to be very useful, if their personal religion is neglected, or hurried over in a formal manner. This the fervent Christian knows; he will therefore redeem time for retirement, at the expense of many inconveniences: and the friends of popular ministers should consider this, and not too much intrude upon the regular and needful hours for retirement of those persons in whose company they most delight.—In prosecuting the work of God, our own inclinations and those of our beloved friends must often be thwarted: we must not “spend our time” with them; when duty calls us another way, or when a prospect is before us of doing more essential good.—As the office of ministers is of the highest importance and difficulty; to instruct, encourage, animate, or admonish those, who now are or hereafter may be employed in it, is a service of very great moment. To do real good to a pastor of the flock, is eventually to profit numbers: and those who have a talent for this service, and a proper call to it, should deem themselves highly honoured, and be satisfied sometimes to omit more public services, for the sake of it. But they, who are thus employed, in instructing such as are to instruct others, should themselves be most unexceptionable characters, and be able to appeal to them respecting their own conduct at all seasons.—All those who are employed in the sacred pastoral service, whether favoured with living monitors, in some degree resembling St. Paul, or not, should consider this charge of the apostle as addressed to them, even as really as to the Ephesian elders; and as thus setting before them the proper conduct, spirit, and principles of a true minister of Christ. A proud, ambitious, selfish, and unfeeling heart, is peculiarly opposite to the service of God, in the pastoral office, or to the proper filling up of eminent stations in the church. Unless a man be “clothed with humility” and softened into love and compassion; his very abilities, zeal, and diligence, will be disgusting and odious. Except we are ourselves deeply affected with the subjects on which we treat, how can we expect to affect others? and how can we convince them, that we indeed mean any thing by our exhortations, unless we persevere in our labours amidst temptations and opposition? We must not be “men-pleasers;” nor may we “keep back any thing that is profitable,” whatever offence may be taken, or however well some persons would reward us, for conniving at their errors and conformity to the world. (Notes, Gal. i. 6—10. 1 Thes. ii. 1—8.)—Indeed the omission of “what is profitable,” because not pleasing, is the grand temptation, and sin, of many who teach no false doctrine, but “shun to declare the whole counsel of God:”

and omissions in this respect, though less disgraceful, are often equally criminal and pernicious with false doctrine.—What we preach publicly we should also be ready to inculcate privately, from house to house, as far as we have access to our hearers, or any prospect of doing them good: and ordinary visits should be thus improved, as well as opportunities of this kind purposely sought for. Thus we shall get acquainted with the state of our people’s souls: a private address to an individual will often set a man right, extricate him from some perplexity, remove some difficulty, or stir him up to some duty, about which he had long hesitated: and we also shall thus learn to exercise our publick ministry to better effect.—Every part of divine truth ought, at one time or other, to be set before our congregations; and every duty inculcated: but the great essentials, without which there can be no salvation, should be testified most earnestly and frequently: nor can we have a better summary of them, than this of the apostle, even “repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ,” with their genuine fruits and effects: without these no sinner can escape destruction, and with these none will come short of eternal life. (Note, Heb. vi. 9, 10.)

V. 22—31.

The powerful influences of the Holy Spirit bind the zealous Christian or minister to his duty, in a manner perfectly consistent with the greatest conceivable liberty: even when he expects persecution and affliction, “the love of Christ constraineth him” to proceed. (Note, 2 Cor. v. 13—15.) When he is satisfied respecting his state and duty, he is not moved with the prospect of difficulties or sufferings; he values his life chiefly that he may glorify the Lord with it; nor is it dear to him, for the sake of any of those things which carnal men pursue. His great desire is “to finish his course with joy,” and to be welcomed by his Lord with “Well done, good and faithful servant;” and if he has received from the Lord Jesus the office of the ministry, to testify to sinners the glad tidings of the grace of God; he will desire to live no longer, than he can execute it honourably and usefully: that when the time shall come, when all “those, among whom he hath gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see his face no more;” he may be able to “take them to record; that he is pure from the blood of all men, having never shunned to declare to them all the counsel of God;” according to the measure in which he was enabled by diligently searching the scriptures, and prayer for divine teaching, to become acquainted with it.—Our Lord Jesus knew perfectly what should befall him at Jerusalem; which exceeded all that any other can possibly suffer or imagine: yet he “steadfastly set his face to go thither.” (Note, Luke ix. 51—

56.) The apostle did not “ know what should befall him ; ” nor do we : but let us be “ followers of him as he was of “ Christ.”—Behold in St. Paul the Christian hero ! No man was ever celebrated as a hero, who had any reserves in the pursuit of his main object ; who could say, I will venture and labour so much, and no more, to attain it. None, who could not say, “ Neither count I my life dear “ to myself,” in this grand concern. But only few can say with the apostle, My salvation is sure ; this pursuit leads to heaven : “ To me to live is Christ, and to die is “ gain.”—When affectionate and faithful pastors are called away from those, to whom they have been useful ; they will be doubly earnest, that they may be succeeded by those who will “ take heed to themselves, and to all their “ flock ; ” such as have indeed been made “ Overseers by “ the Holy Ghost,” and who will feed them with the wholesome doctrine of divine truth. And what ought we to shrink from, when the benefit of that beloved company, “ the church of God, whom he hath purchased with his “ own blood,” requires it at our hands ?—It cannot but lie heavy upon the mind of the faithful minister, when about to be removed from his beloved charge, to reflect upon the various perils, to which they will be exposed, from the subtlety and malice of Satan ; from cruel persecutors, and crafty seducers ; and from such as cause divisions, and “ speak perverse things to draw away disciples after them.” However, he can only warn them and their teachers, to watch : for if the enemy and his servants are so vigilant and indefatigable, we ought by no means to be heedless and indolent : and if a minister, in this case, can take the people to witness, that he has been “ instant in season, “ out of season,” by day and by night, warning and exhorting them with all earnestness and affection ; it will give emphasis to his parting admonitions, and confidence to his own heart when he is constrained to leave them.

V. 32—38.

When we part from our friends and brethren, we should “ commend each other to God, and the word of his grace, “ as able to build us up,” and put us in possession of our holy inheritance : and ministers and their people ought to commend themselves and each other, to God and his word, in the same manner ; that they may be kept by his power, according to his promise, and in obedience to his precept, “ through faith unto” eternal “ salvation.” But none obtain that inheritance, except those whom the Lord has sanctified.—It is peculiarly incumbent on all, who teach others to aspire after a heavenly treasure, to be themselves indifferent about earthly things, and free from all suspicion of “ coveting any man’s gold, or silver, or apparel.” But alas ! few who claim the honour of being ‘ the successors of the apostles,’ in office and authority, are disposed to affect an equality with them in self-denial, and a willingness to labour night and day without emolument, and in circumstances of comparative poverty ! It is indeed probable, that their authority, as successors to the apostles, would be far less questioned, if this were their conduct and spirit. The zealous and prudent minister of Christ, however, who is “ wise to win souls,” will not tenaciously demand even his due maintenance, when it would interfere with his usefulness ; but will “ suffer all things rather than “ hinder the gospel of Christ.” Should peculiar circumstances require or admit of it ; his own hands would minister to his necessities, and those of his family or friends : that he might shew the people all his principles reduced to practice ; and teach even the poor of the flock thus to labour, that they might be able to assist in supporting the weak ; and that every one might learn to enquire, not what gain he shall make, but what good he can do ; according to the words of our gracious Lord, who has taught us, that “ it is more blessed to give than to receive : ” a sentence, that should be written on every heart, especially on that of every minister of the gospel. “ This “ mind was in Christ Jesus ; ” may it be in us also !—Those who thus exhort and pray for one another, may have many weeping seasons, and painful separations ; (Note, 2 Tim. i. 3—5 ;) but “ their sorrow shall be turned “ into joy,” and they will soon meet before the throne to part no more. May the Lord supply his whole church with bishops, presbyters, and pastors of every description, who drink deep into this spirit, and who closely follow the steps of this blessed apostle, and these Ephesian “ overseers of that flock, which he purchased with his own “ blood ! ” Amen, and Amen.

—38.)—Coos and Rhodes were well-known islands in the Egean Sea: Patara was a city of Lycia, upon the continent of Asia. Perhaps the ship, in which Paul and his friends had sailed thus far, was bound to this port. They however met with another, which was about to sail directly into Phenicia, in which they embarked; and, leaving the island of Cyprus on their left hand, they sailed directly to Tyre, where the ship was to unlade her freight. (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Note, xxvii. 4, 5.) Here they sought out the disciples of their Lord: and, as the most dangerous part of their voyage was past, and time enough remained for their journey to Jerusalem before the Pentecost, they continued a week at Tyre; in order, probably, to spend one Lord's day with their brethren, as well as to confer together on the interesting subject of their common faith. Some disciples here also cautioned Paul not to go up to Jerusalem: they were shewn by the Spirit of prophecy, that he would meet with great sufferings and trials, if he went thither; and they supposed that he might lawfully decline the journey and avoid the danger: but he judged otherwise. 'Does the Spirit of God then oppose himself? By no means. . . . But they, understanding, by the revelation of the Spirit, what danger awaited Paul, out of love, and not by any special command of the Spirit, intreated him not to go up to Jerusalem; being ignorant of what the same Spirit had commanded Paul.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, 7—14. xx. 22—24.) When they therefore departed, the whole company of the disciples, with their families, attended them to the seashore, with the greatest expressions of respect and affection; and there they all kneeled down in the most solemn and humble manner, and united in fervent prayer for each other's protection and felicity. (Marg. Ref. l—p.)—Should a company of believers, in this Christian country, and in the environs of one of our great commercial cities, imitate this example; they would doubtless be derided, as a fanatical or hypocritical set of people.—It is most evident, from this circumstance, that kneeling was the general posture for publick and social prayer, in the primitive church; otherwise this company would scarcely have used it in so inconvenient a situation.

V. 7—14. The apostle and his friends finished their voyage when they had sailed from Tyre to Ptolemais, a city on the sea-coast of Galilee, so called, because rebuilt by Ptolemy, king of Egypt; having before been called Accho. (Judg. i. 31.) Here too they met with disciples, with whom they spent only one day; and on the next they journeyed by land to Cæsarea. (Marg. Ref. q. s, t.)—Philip, one of the seven first deacons, whose usefulness as an evangelist is before recorded, now resided in this city; and probably he had laboured there and in the adjacent parts, during the intervening years. (Notes, vi. 2—6. viii. 5—13. 26—40.) He had the peculiar honour of having four daughters, all endued with the gift of prophecy: (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, ii. 14—21. Judg. iv. 4—9. 2 Kings xxii. 14. 1 Cor. xi. 2—16:) and perhaps they gave intimations to Paul of his approaching trials. As, however, he and his friends stayed at Cæsarea several days, Agabus, of whom we read before, (Note, xi. 27—30,) came from Judea, properly so called; (for Cæsarea lay in that part of the land, which belonged to the kings of Israel, not in that belonging to the kings of Judah;) and, with a significant emblem, he certified Paul, by the Holy Spirit, that at Jerusalem he would be seized as a malefactor by the Jews, who would cause him to be bound,

15 And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.

16 There went with us also certain of the disciples of Cæsarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge.

17 And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly.

18 And the day following Paul

hand and foot, and delivered to the Gentiles, as the Lord Jesus had been. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) This prediction induced both the apostle's companions, and the Christians of Cæsarea, earnestly to dissuade him from his intended journey out of love to him, and the value which they set on his useful life and labours. (Marg. Ref. g.) But he considered himself bound in duty, to accomplish the service with which he had been entrusted, of conveying the oblations of the Gentile converts to the church at Jerusalem; and, on this and other accounts, he was stedfastly purposed to proceed, whatever persecutions might await him. The prospect indeed of bonds and imprisonment could not move him; yet the affectionate intreaties of his friends exceedingly distressed his feeling mind: and he earnestly expostulated with them, for thus weeping, and "breaking his heart" with their ill-timed sorrows; which unfitted him for his duty, when they ought to have encouraged him in it: (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, 1—6. xx. 22—24. Matt. xvi. 21—23 :) for, by the grace of God, he was ready to be bound, or even put to death as a martyr, for the honour of his beloved Saviour, either now at Jerusalem, or whenever he should be called to do it. When therefore they saw him fixed in his purpose, they no more attempted to dissuade him from it; but acquiesced in the will of God as to the event, being satisfied that he could and would over-rule it for good. (Marg. Ref. l.)—It was not long after, that the apostle was conveyed back to Cæsarea, a prisoner; and, as he had liberty to see his friends, they would again have the opportunity of conversing with him. (Notes, xxiii. 31—35. xxiv. 22, 23.)—Evangelist. (8) 'Evangelist is the name of an office, in the apostles' times.' Hammond. 'This word occurs only thrice in the New Testament: Acts xxi. 8. V. 15, 16. When the time allotted for the stay of the apostle and his companions at Cæsarea was expired, "they collected and prepared for carriage those things, which were to be taken with them," and went up to Jerusalem. It is probable they travelled on foot: and some think that they carried their luggage themselves; others that they laded beasts of burden with it. (Note, 1 Sam. xvii. 22.) Perhaps it had been conveyed by sea from Ptolemais to Cæsarea, though they journeyed by land: but, as they were now travelling into the interior part of the country, it became necessary to make some other preparation for the conveyance of it. For they carried with them a considerable sum of money from the Gentile converts, to the poor brethren at Jerusalem. (xxiv. 17.)—In this journey, they were attended by some of the disciples of Cæsarea, who "brought them to one Mnason," a native of Cyprus, who then lived at Jerusalem, at whose house the apostle and his company might be conveniently lodged, during the feast. He was "an old disciple:" perhaps he had been a disciple of Jesus, during his abode on earth; or he had joined the church, soon after the day of Pentecost; and had all along maintained (as it must be supposed,) a consistent character, and was now matured in wisdom and grace. V. 17—21. The Christians at Jerusalem gladly welcomed the apostle; rejoicing in the success of his ministry, and in the fruits of the faith and love produced by the Gentile converts. The next day he introduced "the messengers of the churches," to the apostle James; who seems to have been the only one of the twelve then resid-

21 And they are informed of thee, ^a that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, That they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs.

22 What is it therefore? ^b the multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come.

23 Do therefore this that we say to thee: ^c We have four men which have a vow on them;

24 Them take, ^d and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, ^e that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; ^f but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law.

25 As touching the Gentiles which believe, ^g we have written and concluded, that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from strangled, and from fornication.

26 Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them ^h entered into the temple, ⁱ to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them.

ing at Jerusalem, and who peculiarly superintended the concerns of the church in that city: but all the elders were convened on the occasion. After affectionate salutations, Paul proceeded to relate to them particularly, what God had done by his ministry, since he last saw them; (Notes, xv. 1—6. xvi—xx;) at which they rejoiced and glorified God. (Marg. Ref. q—u.) They however intreated him to recollect how many “tens of thousands” of Jewish converts to Christ were now assembled at Jerusalem, who were all zealous for the Mosaick ceremonies, and greatly prejudiced against him for his supposed opposition to them. For they had been informed, and had generally imbibed the opinion, that he every where instructed the Jews to apostatize from Moses; inculcating it as a matter of bounden duty, that they should not circumcise their children, or observe any of the customs of the ritual law. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) In this they had been misinformed: for, though the apostle had shewn, that none were bound to observe the ceremonial law, and that they must by no means place any dependence on such obedience for justification; he had never forbidden the Jewish converts to observe it, as a matter of expediency, when their communion with their Gentile brethren would admit of it. (Note, xvi. 1—3.)—Elders. (18) ‘All the bishops of Judea, saith Dr. Hammond, without one word to ‘prove it.’ Whitby. That learned writer’s zeal for episcopacy leads him frequently to express himself in a manner, which seems to imply that there were no presbyters in the primitive church: perhaps he was not aware, that this supposition would reduce all ministers, above deacons, to an entire parity of order, as effectually as either the presbyterian or the independent plan could do.—How many thousands. (20) Or, “How many tens of thousands.” Gr. This can hardly mean less than forty or fifty thousand: and, though a considerable part of this large number might come from other places to keep the feast; yet it can scarcely be doubted, but that there were so many Christians, stately residing at Jerusalem, as to form several distinct congregations; yet the whole is spoken of as one church.

V. 22—26. Disadvantageous reports had been circulated concerning Paul. His coming would soon be known; the multitude would certainly come together, to enquire into the reasons and motives of his conduct: and much disturbance might arise from their prejudices, if nothing were done to satisfy them. James, therefore, and the elders, enquired what was proper to be done, to counteract their prejudices. And as they had among them four persons, who were under a Nazarite’s vow, the term of which was nearly expiring: they proposed to Paul to join with them as one of the company; that he might purify himself, and bear a part in the expenses of the customary sacrifices, when the time came for them to shave their heads upon the completion of their vow. (Notes, Num. vi. 1—21.) As this would be a publick transaction, his concurrence in it would soon be known: and thus the whole multitude would at once be convinced, that they had been misinformed; and that the apostle himself “walked orderly,” according to the prescriptions of the law. (Marg. Ref. c—f.)—This conclusion seems to have been rather stronger than the real case would admit of. The apostle had before performed a vow of a similar nature; (Note, xviii. 18—23;) and he doubtless paid some regard to the Mosaick law, as a matter of expediency: but he does not appear to have habitually observed it, as it may be inferred from his own words. (Notes, 1 Cor. ix. 19—23. Gal. ii. 11—16. iv. 12—16.) They probably meant, that he attended to the legal ceremonies, as far as his intimate communion with uncircumcised persons would permit him: but it may be questioned, whether this, if it had been fully explained, would have satisfied the persons concerned. James and the elders at the same time avowed, that they intended nothing contrary to their former determination, concerning the gentile converts: (Note, xv. 22—29;) and the apostle, complying with their counsel, took the necessary steps, for joining with the Nazarites in their purifications and oblations. (Marg. Ref. g—i.)—It has been questioned whether on this occasion he and his advisers acted in strict consistency with Christian simplicity: and it should be remembered, that, though the apostles were infallibly preserved from mistaking, corrupting, or mutilating the doctrine, which they were entrusted to communicate to the church; yet they were not rendered infallible in their personal conduct: in many things, they acknowledged, and it is evident, they all offended, and were to be blamed. (Note, Gal. ii. 6—10.) Perhaps it would be found very difficult wholly to defend the apostle from the charge of temporizing, accommodating, or refining too much in this matter. His deference to the judgment of his brethren, his desire of “becoming all things to all men,” and his willingness to conciliate the Jewish believers, seem to have carried him rather too far: and he was led to hold out a greater degree of regard to the Mosaic law, than he shewed in his general conduct. The concession, however, by no means answered the intended purpose; on the contrary, it was the immediate occasion of his predicted sufferings.—“To be at charges” with Nazarites was both a common and a very popular thing among the Jews. ... Maimonides ... asserts, that a person who was not himself a Nazarite, might bind himself by a vow to take part with one in his sacrifice.’ Doddridge.—This, however, not being mentioned in the law, was rather complying with custom and tradition, than shewing a regard for the ceremonies of Moses.—“James and the brethren thought it was most regular and convenient, that the Jewish ritual should still be observed, by those of the circumcision who believed in Christ. And, considering what tribulation the church at Jerusalem must otherwise have been exposed to by the sanhedrim, who no doubt would have prosecuted them to the utmost as apostates; and also how soon Providence intended to render the practice of it impossible; ... it was certainly the most orderly and prudent conduct to conform to it; though it were looked upon by those, that understood the matter fully, (which it was not necessary that all should,) as antiquated and ready to vanish away.’ Ibid.—The Jewish Christians at Jerusalem and in Judea might comply with the law far more easily and exactly, than their brethren could in other countries, who were joined in the same churches with the Gentile converts.—Does not the epistle to the Hebrews, probably written by the apostle when a prisoner at Rome, shew, that he thought it of great importance, even to the Christians in Judea, to understand that the Mosaic law had no longer any validity; and that he considered their attachment to it, as exceedingly unfavourable to their proficiency in true religion? (Preface to Hebrews.)

V. 27—30. As the apostle could not enter on his purification, till the third day after his arrival at Jerusalem; (17, 18. 26;) and as he made his defence before Felix, (which seems to have been seven or eight days after he was apprehended in the temple,) only twelve days after he came to Jerusalem; (Note, xxiv. 10—21;) the first clause should certainly be rendered, “when the seven days were about to be accomplished;” that is, the seven days which had been fixed on, and mentioned to the priests as the term at the end of which the sacrifices would be offered, and the vow performed. (Note, 22—26.)—At this time, some Jews from Asia, (Note, xix. 8—12,) who had known Paul when he preached there, saw him in the inner court of the temple, whither he went to the priests, about the sacrifices to be offered: and, being actuated by a furious and bigoted zeal, they excited a tumult, and seized upon him, as a profaner of that sacred place; calling earnestly on all true Israelites to assist them in a cause, in which their religion and national honour were at stake. For this was the very man, who had every where taught men to disregard their title to be the peculiar people of God; to violate the law of Moses, as abrogated; and to despise the temple as about to be destroyed: (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Note, vi. 9—14:) and to shew his contempt and enmity the more, they averred, that he had brought uncircumcised Gentiles into the holy place to profane it. In this they were mistaken: for, having seen Paul walking in the city with Trophimus, a Gentile convert, they took it for granted, that he had also brought him into the temple. (Notes, xix. 23—31. 32—41, vv. 32—34.) This out-cry, however, soon brought the multitudes from every part of the city; and Paul was dragged as a criminal, to be put to death without the sanctuary, lest it should be defiled with his blood: at the same time the doors were shut, that he might not escape to the horns of the altar for refuge, and that no other Gentiles might enter. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—There was a

they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple: and forthwith the doors were shut.

31 And 'as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the ^u chief captain of the band, ^x that all Jerusalem was in an uproar;

32 Who immediately ^v took soldiers and centurions, ^z and ran down unto them: and when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left ^a beating of Paul.

33 Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded ^b him to ^b be bound with two chains; ^c and demanded who he was, and what he had done.

34 And ^d some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude: and when he could not ^e know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried ^f into the castle.

35 And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers ^g for the violence of the people.

36 For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, ^h Away with him.

37 And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, ⁱ May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek?

38 Art not thou that Egyptian, ^k which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers?

39 But Paul said, ^l I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in ^m Cilicia, ⁿ a citizen of no mean city: and I beseech thee, ^o suffer me to speak unto the people.

40 And when he had given him licence, Paul stood ^p on the stairs, ^q and beckoned with the hand unto the people. And when there was made ^r a great silence, he spake unto them in the ^s Hebrew tongue, saying,

V. 31—36. It has been asserted, that the Jews claimed the liberty of putting to death, without any legal process, such uncircumcised persons as entered the inner courts of the temple: yet even this could not be applicable to Paul. In the fury of their zeal, however, they were about to kill him: but Lysias, the commanding officer of the Roman forces at Jerusalem, being also the tribune, or captain over a thousand men, hearing of the riot, immediately took the centurions and soldiers under his command, or part of them, and hastened to quell it. His presence induced those who were beating Paul, (intending to put him to death by blows with stones or staves,) to suspend their violence: and Lysias, from their rage, concluding that he must be some desperate malefactor, ordered him to be “bound with two chains;” and asked who he was, and of what crime he had been guilty. But, not being able to learn any thing, from the incoherent clamours of the mob, he ordered him to be conveyed to the castle; which stood on an eminence near the temple, being the station of the Roman soldiers who kept guard there. When the soldiers had brought Paul to the stairs, which led to the entrance of the castle, they were obliged to carry him, to prevent the people from violently rushing upon him, and killing him: for they all furiously followed after, exclaiming, “Away with him,” or “Kill him;” for certainly this was their meaning. V. 37—40. When the apostle had been conveyed into the environs of the castle, out of the reach of the multitude, he desired permission from the chief captain to speak to him: who was surprised to hear his prisoner so readily use the Greek language. He indeed supposed him to have been an Egyptian, who, some time before, had made an insurrection in the city, and, leading forth a numerous banditti, had done extensive mischief. For, as that insurgent had escaped, when his followers were destroyed or dispersed, it was natural for Lysias to suppose Paul to be the same person, attempting to excite new disturbances. The apostle however assured him, that he was “a Jew;” and a native of Tarsus, and a citizen of no inconsiderable city: he therefore begged of him, that he might be permitted to address the multitude in order to silence their clamours, and rectify their misapprehensions; by which Lysias also would learn who he was, and what he had done. Accordingly, having obtained permission, he placed himself on the top of the stairs, and made a signal with his hand to the multitude, that he desired to speak to them: and, curiosity concurring with other motives, they observed a profound silence, whilst he addressed them in the Hebrew tongue, at least in that dialect of it which was generally used.—Four thousand, &c. (38) Josephus mentions thirty thousand men, whom this Egyptian, (whose name is not known,) had collected together: but it is probable that he “led forth” only four thousand, and that the rest came to him in the wilderness; or only four thousand of the company were murderers. No doubt many Chaldee words and phrases came into use among the Jews, who returned from the Babylonish captivity. Yet those parts of the Old Testament, which were written after that event, are in Hebrew, except a few passages in Ezra, which are Chaldee, for special reasons. This creates a difficulty, as to the current opinion taken in its full extent. Nor does the language of the New Testament favour it: and several of the arguments used in support of it, are inconclusive. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Wherever zealous Christians travel, they will enquire after their brethren in the Lord, and get acquainted with them; because they delight in their company, and desire to do them good, and to derive benefit from them. (Note, Ps. cxix. 57—63, v. 63.) But, even this sweet and endeared ‘communion of the saints’ must not induce them to prolong their continuance together, beyond what other duties admit of.—Fervent social prayer abates the poignancy of our sorrow, when constrained to separate from those whom we love: and this is peculiarly seasonable, when sharp afflictions or important services lie before us. Our children too should be admitted to such scenes of affection and devotion; that their tender minds may be early im-preach to the gentiles, 1—21. At the mention of the gentiles, the people furiously exclaim against him; and the chief captain orders his soldiers to examine him by scourging, 22—24: which he avoids, by pleading the privilege of a Roman citizen, 25—29. He is brought before the council, 30.

pressed with a sense of the excellency and importance of religion: (Note, Gen. xviii. 1. P. O. 1—8.) Thus we may hope, that when they grow up, they will be evidently partakers of the blessing, and endued with spiritual gifts, for the edification of others also; which should be considered as the greatest favour God can bestow on us, with respect to our offspring.—The path of duty will eventually be that of safety: yet it often leads into many apparent, or temporary, dangers and difficulties; the prospect of which may induce those, who value the useful lives of eminent persons, to dissuade them from the services allotted to them: but, if they are satisfied of their call in Providence; they should not turn aside, out of concern or affection for their friends, any more than from fear of their enemies. It is, however, an extraordinary attainment, for the same man to be so firm and inflexible, in following the dictates of his own conscience, as to be habitually ready to endure bonds, or face death for the Lord’s sake; and yet so full of tenderness and sympathy, as to be more affected by the sorrows of his friends, than by the prospect of his own perils and sufferings. (Note, Phil. ii. 24—30.)—When we have given the best counsel we can, to those who conscientiously desire to know the will of God; and yet find that they are not convinced, or persuaded, by what we have urged; we should desist, and acquiesce in the will of the Lord, who can educe good from those measures and events, which seem to us undesirable or inexpedient.—In our endeavours to do good to our brethren, we should introduce them to the acquaintance of those, who have been a comfort or benefit to us: and “old disciples” should be accessible; as well as careful to set their younger brethren an example of humility, spirituality, steadfastness, zeal, prudence, candour, and enlarged love; which may evince, that their dependence on the Lord, and devotedness to him, have increased, according to the years during which they have known him. (Notes, Heb. v. 11—14. Rev. ii. 2—5. P. O. 2—7.)

V. 17—26.

What a striking proof is it of the weakness and depravity of human nature, that so large a proportion of the disciples of Christ, even in the days of the apostles, were exceedingly disaffected to the most eminent minister, probably, who ever lived! Neither his extraordinary conversion, his blameless and holy character, his peculiar endowments, his extensive labours and usefulness, or his patient sufferings in the cause of Christ; nor yet the oblations which he bestowed so much pains to collect, and bring from the Gentile converts to their Jewish brethren, could conciliate their esteem and affection: because he would not render that respect to the antiquated Mosaic ceremonial, with which they had been used to regard it! Nor could even the authority of James and the pious elders pacify their minds, or prevent their tumultuously assembling together; when they heard that he was come

MEN, brethren, and fathers, hear ye ^b my defence which I make now unto you.

2 (And when they heard that he spake ^c in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence: and he saith,)

3 I am verily a man which am ^d a Jew, ^e born in Tarsus, ^f a city in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city ^g at the feet of ^h Gamaliel, ⁱ and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, ^k and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day.

4 And ^l I persecuted ^m this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women.

to Jerusalem! How watchful then should we be against prejudices of every kind; and against those misrepresentations of men's principles and conduct, from which prejudices commonly originate! And how patient should we be, if called to have fellowship with the great apostle of us Gentiles in this affliction; and to endure the suspicions and coldness, of those whom we most esteem and love! We ought indeed to use all proper methods of rectifying the judgments and conciliating the affections of our brethren, as far as their misapprehension can interfere with our usefulness: yet we should watch against the temptation of conniving at those errors or evils, which are the general source of prejudices, and which cannot consistently be countenanced. When accommodation is allowed to infringe upon our "simplicity and godly sincerity," it will seldom produce any good effect. Our brethren will not be satisfied, unless we go to the full length of their sentiments; others will begin to suspect our integrity, and to hesitate concerning us; and it is in vain to attempt conciliating the favour of graceless bigots, and furious zealots of any party, from whom we shall commonly do well to keep at a distance. But much wisdom, integrity, and humility are requisite, to guide us in the middle way, between an uncomplying inflexibility in things of small consequence, and a temporizing spirit in respect of important truth. (P. O. 1 Cor. ix. 19—27.) Yet, the Lord will preserve his upright servants from fatal mistakes; though he may see good to leave them to err, in matters of less importance, and in some particular instances.

V. 27—40.

Those who idolize notions, or "the form of godliness," while they hate the power of it, will misrepresent or condemn that conduct, which God most approves and blesses: thus, if part of the truth be misrepresented, but not rendered sufficiently odious, to exasperate a sect, or a mob, against the objects of their detestation; some false accusation will be devised more fully to effect the purpose: and, as the cause of God is supposed to be at stake, all means are sanctified, by which the help and concurrence of multitudes can be ensured. On these occasions, the professed worshippers of God too often copy the example of the most infuriated idolaters: (P. O. xix. 21—31:) and innocency or excellency is no security to any man's life: for, in popular tumults, all discrimination of character, and distinction between truth and error, are confounded. Professed attachments to this or the other party or church among Christians, will readily give energy to the clamour. "Men of Israel, help, &c." The church is in danger! Our religious liberties are in danger! And the groundless outcry may affect the lives or characters, even of the most prudent, benevolent, and pious servants of our God! He, however, is at all times a Refuge for his people: and he sometimes over-rules the fury of their enemies to raise them up friends among such as are strangers to him; who become favourable to them, because they find that they are not those vile characters, which they have been represented, or suspected to be. And, if he gives us an opportunity of pleading our own cause before those who are prejudiced against us; we should always prepare to speak decidedly and boldly in behalf of the truth, and earnestly to recommend the gospel of Christ to their most serious attention.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—5. The apostle addressed the enraged multitude, in the customary stile of respect and goodwill, as "men and brethren;" and, seeing many principal persons present, he also added "fathers," to denote, that he was ready to render them all due honour and obedience, consistent with the will of God, notwithstanding their indignation against him. (Marg. Ref. a.—vii. 2. Note, i. 16—18.) When therefore they found, that he spoke so composedly to them, in the Hebrew dialect, they observed a strict silence; and he proceeded to shew, that he was a Jew, and not a Gentile or a proselyte; and though born at Tarsus, that he had been educated in Jerusalem by Gamaliel, the most eminent of their Rabbies. (Note, v. 33—39.) At his feet he had been used to sit: according to the custom of those times, when the scholars sat on the ground, or on low seats near the teacher, who was raised above them on a sort of throne. (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 3. Mark v. 14—20. Luke x. 38—42.) Paul had therefore been instructed after the most accurate manner, in the law of Moses, and in the traditions of the elders; and was a zealot for their manner of worshipping God; as he knew them to be zealots at that time. Of this he had given abundant proof, by persecuting those who sought the favour of God, in the "way" of the gospel; doing all in his power, to get them put to death, or cast into prison, without distinction, whether men or women. priest, who was then in authority, could bear witness, as well as the other members of the Sanhedrim; for he had received letters from them to the brethren, or the Jews, at Damascus, against the Christians in that city. But he would now relate to them the manner, in which he had since that time, been induced to embrace and preach that doctrine which he then so furiously persecuted.

Defence. (1) Or, Apology. The sacred writers never use this word, or the correspondent verb, except when the person spoken of defended himself from some charge brought against him. They never in one instance call the authoritative preaching of the gospel an apology. (Marg. Ref. b.) And, whatever may be urged in favour of the word, in this age of apologies, it indisputably conveys the idea of a cautious defensive war against impiety and infidelity, rather than of that boldness and decision, with which the cause of God and truth ought to be supported.—Απολογία. xxv. 16. 1 Cor. ix. 3. 2 Cor. vii. 11. 1 Phil. i. 7. 17. 2 Tim. iv. 16. 1 Pet. iii. 15. Απολογεομαι. V. 6-13. (Marg. Ref.—xxvi. 12-15. Notes, ix. 3-22.) It is evident, that the apostle considered his extraordinary conversion, as a most complete demonstration of the truth of Christianity: and when all the particulars of his education, his previous religious principles, his zeal, enmity against Christians, and prospects of secular honours and preferments by persecuting them, are compared with the subsequent part of his life, and the sudden transition from a furious persecutor to a zealous preacher of the gospel, in which he laboured and suffered to the end of his life, and for which he died a martyr; it must convince every candid and impartial person, that no rational account can be given of this change, except that which he himself assigns: and if that be true, Christianity is divine. (Note, ix. 31.)—Heard not the voice, &c. (9) The persons attending the apostle heard a sound, but did not distinguish that articulate voice, in which the Lord Jesus addressed Saul by name. V. 14-16. The God of Abraham had chosen Saul the persecutor, as the object of his special love: in consequence of this, he had also purposed, that he should know his will; and “see that Just One,” who came to save sinners; and also hear, believe, and obey his voice, as speaking immediately to him. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) This purpose he had begun to effect, as Saul journeyed to Damascus: and he would have further visions of him, and revelations of his will; that he might be fully qualified to be his apostle, a witness of his resurrection, to men of all nations, and likewise of all that he himself had seen and heard. As he had therefore such full proof of the Lord’s abundant and gratuitous love to him, notwithstanding his most aggravated crimes, and of his purpose to employ him as his minister; why should he doubt any longer, or hesitate to profess his faith by being baptized, as an outward sign of the washing away of his sins, and the seal, to him

V. 17—21. The apostle, having shewn his hearers, in what manner he was induced to become a Christian, and how he was appointed a preacher of the gospel, proceeded to declare the way, in which he had been led to exercise his ministry chiefly among the Gentiles ; as this was the principal cause of their peculiar rage against him. A considerable time after his conversion, he came up to Jerusalem ; and, while worshipping in the court of the temple, he was thrown into a trance, or ecstasy, in which he, even the Lord Jesus, appeared to him in vision, and commanded him speedily to leave that city, for the Jews would not receive his testimony concerning him. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, ix. 23—30.) To this he ventured to object, that as they were in general acquainted with the severities which he had exercised against the Christians, and especially his concurrence in the martyrdom of Stephen ; he had a confidence, that they would regard his testimony as to the manner of his conversion, and attend to the gospel as preached by him. But the Lord silenced this plea, and directed him to depart without delay, as he had purposed to employ him at a great distance among the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, xxvi. 16—18.)—Doubtless many who heard the apostle, on this occasion, could well remember the facts to which he referred, and attest them to others. He therefore hoped to convince the multitude, that his labours among the Gentiles were not the result of his own choice, as he earnestly desired to have been useful to his countrymen : but at the same time this mission intimated the approaching rejection of the Jewish nation, as well as the calling of the Gentiles into the church.

V. 22—30. The Jews patiently attended to the apostle’s account of his own conversion : but when he declared that he was sent by Jesus himself to preach to the Gentiles ; this was so contrary to their bigoted self-preference, their contempt of other nations, and all their religious prejudices, that they would endure no more ; so that, in the most furious rage, they cried out, that such a fellow ought to

was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him.

be dragged away to immediate death, for it was "not fit for him to live" on the earth: seeing he thus openly preferred uncircumcised idolaters to the covenanted people of God. (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, 1 Thes. ii. 13—16.) Amidst these exclamations they cast off their clothes, either as preparing to stone him to death if they could get hold of him, or to express their abhorrence of his supposed blasphemy: and they threw dust into the air, as frantick with rage; or that it might fall and cover them, to denote the greatness of their horror at what had been said. (Marg. Ref. i.) This conduct might well astonish the tribune, who could not possibly understand, what had wrought them up to such an excess of fury: he indeed concluded, that Paul had certainly committed some peculiarly atrocious crime with which he was not acquainted. He would not however give him up to their resentment: but, according to the barbarous and irrational practice, in use even among the Romans, (as it is in many nations to this day,) he ordered him to be examined by severe scourging; till the anguish of the stripes inflicted on him, should extort from him a confession of his guilt. When the soldiers were binding him with thongs to a pillar, or block, for that purpose, he demanded of the centurion, whom the tribune had charged with this service, whether it were lawful for them thus to scourge a Roman citizen, who had not been condemned for any crime. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, xvi. 35—40.) A Roman might not be punished before he was legally condemned, nor scourged in this manner at all; which was far more severe, than the scourging with rods: and, as it was even unlawful to bind him with thongs, in order to examination by torture, though not to put fetters upon him in order to confine him; the centurion was led by this question, to caution the tribune to take care what he did; who came to the apostle to enquire whether he really were a Roman. He had himself purchased this valuable privilege for a great sum of money: and, as Paul was a Jew, apparently in very low circumstances, he questioned him how he had acquired it: but the apostle informed him, that he was free born. He had before mentioned his being a citizen of Tarsus, yet the tribune had not thence inferred, that he was entitled to the privilege of a Roman citizen: so that it is probable, all the citizens of the Roman colonies had not this privilege; or that Tarsus was not a colony. Paul, however, satisfied the tribune that he was a Roman; and so the design of torturing him by scourging, to make him confess some crime which could not be proved, was given up; and the tribune feared lest he should be called to account for having bound him. Instead therefore, of using this method to discover his guilt, he, on the morrow, summoned the council, and brought Paul, freed from his fetters, before them to be examined. Hence we may infer, that a great number of the principal persons in the nation had joined with the multitude, in their vehement and outrageous zeal against the apostle.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The honour of the gospel requires its advocates to speak with temper, benevolence, and respect to their superiors; as well as with boldness and constancy, in the midst of all the ill usage, to which they may be exposed.—A simple narration of the Lord's dealings with us, in bringing us from opposing, to profess and promote, his gospel, when it is delivered with modesty and caution, will generally make more impression on the minds of men, than laboured arguments or rhetorical declamations. Indeed, the conversion and experience of some individuals have been so remarkable, that the recital of them has great force of argument in it: though it seldom, if ever, amounts to that complete demonstration of the truth, which arose from the change wrought in the character and conduct of the apostle.—Natural abilities, the advantages of education, proficiency in learning, exactness in a system, and a fervent religious zeal according to that system, may be either valuable or mischievous; as they are directed, under the influence of divine grace, in support of the truth, or as employed by men's selfish passions in defence of error. Zeal, especially, is an ambiguous attainment: it may be a violent, cruel, and dreadful flame, kindled from beneath, and destroying all around it with fatal vehemence; or it may be a gentle, active, kind, and heavenly principle, powerfully influencing the possessor to every thing excellent and beneficial, in the persevering use of the most unexceptionable means of obtaining the most important ends. (Note, Jam. iii. 13—16.)

V. 6—21.

Many, who for a time have devoted their talents to the service of delusion and error, have afterwards been induced

CHAP. XXIII.

Paul, pleading his conscientiousness before God, is smitten at the command of the high priest, whom he reproves for his injustice, 1—3. Being censured for it, he excuses the sharpness of his language, 4, 5. Declaring himself a Pharisee, in respect of the resurrection, a division in the council is excited, 6—9. The chief captain, fearing lest he should be torn in pieces, conveys him back to the castle, 10. The Lord favours him, by a most encouraging vision, 11. Forty Jews conspire to murder him; binding themselves by oath, not to eat or drink till they have done it, 12, 13. They avow their purpose to the chief priests, and secure their concurrence, 14, 15. The conspiracy is discovered to Paul, and from him to the chief captain, 16—22; who sends Paul, under a strong guard, and with a letter, to Felix the governor at Cæsarea, 23—35.

to consecrate them to the cause of Christ. The Lord having chosen the sinner, "that he should know his will;" he is awakened, humbled, illuminated, and brought acquainted with Jesus and his blessed gospel. Being acknowledged as a "brother," by those who were disciples before him, he makes profession of his faith, calls on the Redeemer's name, receives the comfort of being "washed from his sins," and testifies to others, what he has heard and learned of the Saviour's glory and grace. Thus he passes from Satan's kingdom to that of Christ, and begins to seek its peace and prosperity; while his former associates are surprised, offended, or enraged, at the revolution which has taken place. When a man is thus admitted among the servants of Christ, he is often employed in such services, as disconcert all his own plans and purposes. Not being wholly weaned from "leaning to his own understanding," he is sometimes reluctant to renounce his favourite plan, even after he has been praying for direction respecting the will of God! A person in these circumstances often imagines, that his former friends, having known his contempt and enmity against the truth, will pay the more attention to his testimony on that account; and that his former zeal for some form or party, and against those tenets which he deemed enthusiastical and erroneous, will induce them to enquire into the grounds of the change which has taken place. Perhaps he thinks that their opposition arises mainly from misinformation; and that if the truth were fairly set before them, they could not resist the evidence of it. Thus he may practically forget, that nothing can reconcile the heart of fallen man to the gospel, except the special grace of God; that "a prophet is not without honour save in his own country;" and that a servant of Christ may expect a more favourable hearing from entire strangers, than from prejudiced neighbours, relatives, and acquaintance; who commonly treat his attempts to convince them, as a usurpation of authority to which he is not entitled. (Note, Matt. xiii. 54—58. P. O. 51—58.)

V. 22—30.

When the servants of Christ, in obedience to his express command, turn from those who reject their testimony, and seek for more favourable hearers; those whom they leave

4 And they that stood by, said, Re- volest thou God's high priest?

5 Then said Paul, ⁱ I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest: for will sometimes be highly displeased.—Bigotry and spiritual pride are commonly connected with furious wrath and intolerant malice: and it is well for mankind, that the power of persecutors is often inadequate to their rage; otherwise they would drive all the servants of Christ out of the earth, as unfit to live upon it. (Note, Heb. xi. 35—38.) But the Lord mercifully restrains their madness, by subjecting them to more moderate men. For, though many iniquities have been practised by magistrates, not professing any great regard to religion, even in civilized nations; yet their severity is commonly tender mercy, compared with the cruelty of enraged bigots, when advanced to authority: and their haste in punishing is deliberation and caution, compared with the fury of a licentious mob, when excited by frantick persecutors.—But how great a privilege is it to be governed according to a written law! that if a magistrate is about to act unjustly, it may be demanded of him, whether this be lawful; and suggested to him, to take heed what he does, lest he should expose himself to a judicial rebuke. Christians are allowed to avail themselves of these privileges: our birth-right as Britons (who are far more favoured in Providence, than even the Roman citizens were,) is not forfeited by our becoming the subjects of Christ; though we should insist upon our privileges, with great modesty, prudence, and quietness.—We should, however, most of all value that freedom, to which all the children of God are born; and which the largest sums of money cannot, in any measure, purchase for such as remain unregenerate. (Note and P. O. Gal. iv. 21—31.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—5. When the apostle was placed before the Sanhedrim, he stedfastly viewed it, to observe of what persons it now consisted; and, as confidently looking at those, who formerly employed him in persecuting the Christians: and he then solemnly protested, that he had "to that day lived," or acted as a member of the community, "in all good conscience towards God." The rulers, priests, and people were ready to condemn him as a most atrocious criminal, for embracing the gospel, and preaching it to the Gentiles: but he declared, that in these things he had not acted from sinister motives, but out of it is written, ^k Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

6 But when ^l Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, ^m Men and brethren, ⁿ I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: ^o of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.

7 And when he had so said, ^o there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees; and the multitude was divided.

8 For the ^p Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel

9 And there arose a great cry: and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, ^q We find no evil in this man: but ^r if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, ^s let us not fight against God.

10 And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, ^t fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, ^u and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

a conscientious regard to his duty, in the sight of God, in which he had persevered amidst many trials to that very time.—He had indeed acted according to his conscience, when he persecuted the Christians: but this was the result of pride, ignorance, inattention, and obstinate self-will; and it can hardly be supposed, that he would call this “a good conscience before God.” The council, however, would have given him credit for that part of his life: his object therefore evidently was, to shew that he had acted conscientiously and on good grounds, in those things, which they deemed deserving of death; and he doubtless meant more fully to have explained his reasons and motives, if the council would have heard them. (Marg. Ref. a. e.) But the high priest, being a leading person in this prosecution, and aware that Paul’s protestation of innocence implied a charge of malice and injustice against his virulent enemies, ordered him to be “smitten on the “mouth,” for pleading ‘not guilty,’ when they were determined to condemn him! This was oppressive, iniquitous, and illegal in the extreme: and the apostle immediately denounced the judgment of God upon him for it, and for his other crimes; and declared him to be “a whited wall,” or a hypocrite, who might be compared to a wall formed of the meanest materials, but whited over and made to have a fair outside. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 25—28.) This appeared, in that he, when sitting in the council to judge him according to the law of God, instead of enquiring into the merits of his cause, had ordered him, by a direct violation of that law, to be smitten, before he was proved guilty of any fault, or even impropriety in his behaviour. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 24, 25. Jer. xx. 1—6. John xviii. 19—23.)—‘Ananias carried it very plausibly towards the citizens, and stood high in their favour: yet he impiously and cruelly defrauded the inferior priests of their legal subsistence, so that some of them even perished for want. And God did remarkably smite him: for after his own house had been reduced to ashes, in a tumult begun by his own son, he was besieged and taken in the royal palace; where, having in vain attempted to hide himself in an old aqueduct, he was dragged out and slain.’ Doddridge.—But though the answer of Paul contained a just rebuke, and an evident prediction; yet he seems to have been too much carried away by indignation at the base usage which he had experienced:

being therefore censured for “reviling God’s high priest;” he pleaded, that he was not aware that Ananias was the high priest. It seems unreasonable to suppose, that the apostle would, in such circumstances, question his title to his office, though the scripture referred to rather points out Ananias’s office as supreme magistrate, than his sacred function. (Note, Ex. xxii. 28.) It is however probable, that the apostle meant to allow, that, in the warmth of his spirit, he had not adverted to the person who had given the orders, or was not aware that he was the high priest. Perhaps the high priest in the Sanhedrim was not always to be known by his seat, or his garments; and Ananias did not fill that office, when Paul had been more intimately conversant with that assembly. But it is not very clear, whether the apostle intended by this concession to waive the question concerning his speaking by “the Spirit of “prophecy,” as not choosing to insist on it; or whether he allowed that he had spoken too sharply, and could not justify the whole of his answer, or propose it to the imitation of others. V. 6—10. The apostle personally knew many members of the Sanhedrim; and he was aware, that there were two parties among them of opposite principles, and very vehement in their contests with each other; though they were now agreed in persecuting him. thenticated; he attempted to divert their violence from himself upon each other. Accordingly, he cried aloud, "I am a Pharisee, and the son of a Pharisee;" he had been educated in the opinions of that sect, and still maintained the principal doctrines, which were controverted between them and the Sadducees: (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, xxvi. 4—8. Phil. iii. 1—7, v. 5;) nay, indeed he was called in question at that time, for professing the hope, and bearing testimony to the reality, of the resurrection of the dead. The principal fact, which he attested as the apostle of Christ, was his resurrection from the dead to be the first-fruits of his people; and all the doctrines of the gospel were intimately connected with that fundamental principle. The first persecution of the church was excited by the testimony of the apostles to the resurrection of their crucified Lord; and the Sadducees took the lead in it, because "they preached through Jesus the resurrection of the dead." (Note, iv. 1—3.) The enmity also of many in the council against Paul, at this time, was increased by their consciousness, that his doctrine was wholly subversive of their favourite sentiment: so that in every way, he was called to account for preaching Jesus as risen, and the hope and doctrine of a future resurrection. This was therefore an evident truth: he was not obliged to bring forward all the doctrines which he professed, when not interrogated about them: and it seems to have been entirely justifiable in him, by this seasonable profession of his faith on this controverted point, to draw off the Pharisees from the side of his persecutors; and to induce them to afford him some protection amidst all this illegal violence. At the same time he shewed a most consummate sagacity, and a deep acquaintance with the human heart, and of that universal disposition, which continually manifests itself, of favouring those, who take our part in any contested point. 'Grant me discernment, I allow it you.' Cowper. Accordingly, this declaration was so pleasing to the Pharisees, that their rage was for the time disarmed: and the Sadducees being proportionably exasperated, the two parties began eagerly to dispute about "the resurrection of the dead," and the existence of angels, and of separate spirits; the one contending for these doctrines, and the other arguing against them, with the greatest violence. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, Matt. iii. 7—10. xxii. 23—33.) At length those scribes, who espoused the party of the Pharisees, (being sharpened against their antagonists, and perceiving that the apostle's doctrine and narrative tended to establish their tenets, and to subvert those of the Sadducees,) declared that they could not find him guilty of any crime: and, though they did not believe what he said concerning Jesus of Nazareth; yet if an angel, or the spirit of some deceased person, had spoken to him; (as doubtless this had often been done, for thus they assumed the point in contest;) it did not become them "to fight against God," by punishing him. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—There is a great similarity between this speech, and the counsel which Gamaliel had formerly given; and perhaps there was a reference to it, though it is probable, that he died before this time. (Note, v. 33—39.)—The contest, however, at length became so fierce between the parties, that Lysias, who seems to have been present, began to apprehend, they would tear Paul in pieces in their fury; and therefore he ordered him to be taken from them by force, and conveyed into the castle. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—What must this heathen have thought of the worshippers of ΙΕΡΟΥΣΑΛΗΜ, when he saw this assembly of chief priests, learned scribes, and rulers of Israel, forgetful of what became their rank, profession, and sacred character; and carried away by an unbridled rage, in their religious contests, to those excesses, which the Roman senators and magistrates, or principal persons, would have been ashamed of, even in their eager competition for pre-eminence and dominion?

V. 11. (Notes, xviii. 9—11. xxvii. 20—26.) The apostle had been repeatedly delivered from the most imminent danger: but he was still confined in prison; and knew that the desperate malice of his numerous enemies would leave nothing unattempted, in order to take away his life. He might therefore, perhaps, be under some discouragement in respect of his situation: but his gracious Lord was pleased to appear before him, assuring him that he accepted of his testimony concerning him in Jerusalem; and that his desire, of attesting his truth at Rome also, would certainly be granted. (Note, xix. 21, 22.) This ensured his protection against all his enemies, who might "fight with him, but could not prevail against him." (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jer. i. 17—19.)—'Here is an instance of a divine appointment, without any necessity laid on the will of Paul.' Whitby. This erroneously supposes, that they, with whom this learned writer meant to contend, held that the divine decrees laid a necessity on the human will! (Notes, ii. 22—24, v. 23. iv. 23—28, v. 28.) In fact the instance proves, beyond all controversy, that an event may be certainly determined by almighty God, and infallibly come to pass; though all parties concerned exercise the utmost free-agency, of which the rational nature is capable. Some argue from this vision, that the Lord approved of the apostle's conduct: but, though this is undoubtedly true as to the grand outline, yet the vision no more proves that the conduct of the apostle was free from all mixture of infirmity, than the vision, with which Jacob was favoured at Bethel, proves that he had not sinned in fraudulently obtaining the blessing. (Notes, Gen. xxvii. 6—14. xxviii. 16, 17.) The actions of men must be judged of by the law of God; and not by the event, or by any special instances of the Lord's unmerited kindness to them.

V. 12—22. The Jews, perceiving that Lysias was resolved to protect Paul, unless legally convicted of some crime, began to fear that their malice would be disappointed. Therefore forty of the most zealous of them, (probably not members of the council, nor yet persons of a low rank,) supposing that they should do God service by murdering his minister, (Notes, xxvi. 9—11. John xvi. 1—3,) conspired together, engaging by a solemn oath, and an anathema, or imprecation of divine vengeance on themselves, if they tasted either meat or drink till they had slain Paul. So far indeed from being ashamed of this most atrocious intended assassination, they gloried in it as highly meritorious! and, knowing that many of the priests and the elders of the council would favour the design; (for the Sadducees seem to have been the more numerous in that assembly;) they informed them of their whole plan, and assigned them the part, which they should perform in order to accomplish it; while the guilt or odium of the measure, if there were any, would rest wholly on the conspirators. (Marg. Ref. b—g.—Note, xxv. 1—5.) It is not known, by what means Paul's nephew discovered this conspiracy: but as so many persons were privy to it, and as the conspirators aimed to conceal it from Lysias and his friends alone, till it was executed; they might not all be very cautious in speaking of it. Providence, however, took this method of detecting and disappointing it. Paul, though assured of protection, deemed it his duty to use every proper means for his own safety: (Notes, 11. xxvii. 23—32;) and the conduct of Lysias towards the young man shewed much affability, good sense, generosity, and regard to truth and equity; which, in a heathen, formed a striking contrast to the insidious, violent, cruel, and iniquitous conduct of the Jewish priests and rulers, who were evidently ripe for vengeance. (Marg. Ref. h—r.)—^c Such execrable vows as these were not unusual among the Jews, who challenged to themselves a right of punishing those, without any legal process, whom they considered as transgressors of the law; and in some cases thought, that they were justified in killing them. ... It is no wonder, therefore, that these Jews should make no scruple of acquainting the chief priests and elders with their conspiracy against the life of Paul; who were so far from blaming them for it, that not long after they renewed the same design themselves. (xxv. 2, 3.) ... Dr. Lightfoot has shewn from the Talmud, that if they were prevented from accomplishing such vows as these, it was an easy matter to obtain an absolution from their Rabbies. Dodridge.—The Rabbies, however, could not deliver them from the curse of God, which they had imprecated on themselves; though they gave them leave to eat and drink, notwithstanding their vow.

V. 23, 24. The desperate measures of the Jews, no doubt, confirmed Lysias in his determination to protect his prisoner; but, by keeping him at Jerusalem, insurrections might have been excited, and some opportunity might have been afforded to his vigilant enemies, of murdering him. He therefore resolved to send him to Felix, the Roman governor, who resided at Cæsarea, which is computed to have been about seventy miles from Jerusalem. The body of Roman soldiers, appointed to escort him, consisting of two hundred legionary soldiers, two hundred light-armed foot-soldiers, and seventy horsemen, would have sufficed to repel any tumultuary assault of the Jews: but to prevent bloodshed, they were ordered to set off about three hours after sun-set, that they might be out of the reach of the zealots before morning. This prudent precaution was accompanied by one equally humane: Paul was not required to walk with the soldiers, who had been accustomed to long and speedy marches; but they were ordered to provide beasts, mules, or horses, changing them when necessary; that he might be conducted safely and conveniently to Cæsarea. V. 25—30. This epistle, which is a good specimen of the Roman method of writing letters, may be considered as a model of brevity, simplicity, and perspicuity. The customary title of respect to a superior, and expression of good-will, are once only made use of: and in this it differs exceedingly from modern epistles, to persons of high rank and authority; which are generally enumbered with multiplied compliments, and ascriptions of honour.—Lysias, however, was careful not to intimate to Felix, that he had bound Paul, in order to scourge him: and, as we suppose this to have been an exact copy of the letter, it appears, he was willing Felix should conclude, that his interposition in Paul's favour arose from a previous knowledge that he was a Roman citizen; though it is evident this was not the case. (Notes, xxi. 31—40. xxii. 22—30.) In other respects, the account was fair and candid; and we cannot wonder that a heathen should state his conduct in that light, which was most favourable to his own reputation and advancement, and not likely to injure any man. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

To rejoice in the testimony of a good conscience before God, amidst calumnies and persecutions, is an invaluable blessing: but this cannot be habitually possessed, except by the constant exercise of faith in Christ, and an upright obedience to his commandments. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 12—14.)—No rank, learning, authority, religious profession, or sacred function, can change the pride and selfishness of the human heart: but iniquity and oppression are most hateful, when committed in courts of justice, and masked with pretensions to piety. (Notes, Ps. xiv. 20, 21. Is. x. 1—4.) The actors, in such atrocious hypocrisy, are “whited walls” and “painted sepulchres,” whom God will smite with distinguished vengeance.—The best of men are liable, when greatly injured and insulted, to be put off their guard: and even that zeal and faithfulness, which the Holy Spirit dictates, in warning sinners of approaching ruin, will sometimes be mingled with the remains of our sinful passions, and prompt us to “speak unadvisedly with our lips.” But, whether in reality, or only in appearance, we speak or act inconsistently with the divine precepts; it is in general adviseable to decline a strenuous justification of ourselves, and to admit that our conduct was in some respects unfit for imitation: and in no ordinary circumstances should we by any means “speak evil” of our rulers; whatever their characters may be, or however they may have injured us; for the Christian’s maxims are, to honour those in authority, and “to overcome evil with good.” (Notes, Rom. xiii. 1—5 Tit. iii. 1, 2. 1 Pet. ii. 13—17. 2 Pet. ii. 10, 11. Jude 9, 10.)

V. 6—11.

“The wisdom of the serpent,” as well as “the harmlessness of the dove,” is necessary for us, amidst “unreasonable and wicked men.” It is useless to urge the most conclusive arguments, when we know that our cause is already prejudged: and it is lawful, on some occasions, to seek the protection of one party against the violence of another, by declaring that we agree with them in many important doctrines; provided this can be said consistently with exact truth. Thus we may sometimes divert the storm which we could not repress, and divide the counsels of the enemies of the gospel.—Among those who oppose spiritual religion, some come nearer to the truth than others: and though self-righteous Pharisees are to be warned and shunned; yet Sadducees and infidels, who deny all the doctrines of revealed religion, should be still more strenuously opposed.—In every controversy, especially relating to religion, an appeal to men’s passions and prejudices, and an avowed preference of their tenets to those of their opponents, will generally go further, than either sound arguments, or exemplary conduct, in softening their resentment, and securing their esteem. Allow them to have truth on their side, and they will be disposed in some measure to grant you the same: for man is a vain-glorious creature, who courts flattery, and would have his own opinion considered as the standard of truth! A practical uniform attention to this characteristic of our fallen nature seems the grand device for managing mankind; whether among the giddy multitude, or in the great councils of nations, or in ecclesiastical conventions. But it is a delicate operation, which requires great skill and caution; and there is imminent danger of deviating from strict “simplicity and godly sincerity,” into carnal policy, whenever we have recourse to it: though we may avail ourselves of it on some great emergency; and when it may evidently be done, without at all receding from our principles, and to the advantage of the truth.—But what a scandal is it, when the professors and ministers of true religion are so furious in their contests, that idolatrous and ungodly men ery shame of their violence, and are constrained to interpose authority, or military force, to quell the riot, and prevent more fatal consequences! or when national and ecclesiastical assemblies more resemble a meeting of furious assassins, than a convention of legislators, or the servants of God! Yet this has often been the case, and the fury of controversy is not yet extinct.—But the Lord Jesus will be the comfort and refuge of his faithful servants, amidst all dangers and troubles, till their testimony and work be finished: and did their enemies know, how sweet their secret consolations are, they would be far less surprised at their fortitude and patience in publick.

V. 12—35.

The corruption of the best things becomes the worst: erroneous religious principles, zealously espoused by carnal men, dictate such enormities, as others seem scarcely capable of; and thus the most horrid villainies have been perpetrated, not only without remorse, but with exultation.—How careful should we be not to vow and to bind ourselves to what is criminal, or may be impracticable; and not to trifle with oaths and imprecations! For, through neglect of such precautions, men are drawn into wickedness, and expose themselves to vengeance, which way soever they turn themselves: nor will evasions or dispensations from whatever quarter extricate them from the snare. All that in this case can be done, is to repent, and seek forgiveness of so great a wickedness. The Lord with perfect ease disappoints the best concerted schemes of iniquity, and detects the most secret devices of his enemies. He has instruments for every work: the natural abilities, or cultivated minds, and moral virtues of heathens, have often been employed, in the protection of his persecuted servants: for they can discern between the unaffected conscientiousness of upright believers, and the zeal of false professors; though they disregard or do not understand their doctrinal principles.—Nothing spiritually good can indeed be found in our fallen nature, except as the fruit of renewing grace: yet a regard to truth, equity, and hu-

evening, as well as their other frequent and incessant religious observances, implied the same hope. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) And, as the resurrection of Jesus was proved, by most unexceptionable and abundant testimony, and might be shewn to be the fulfilment of ancient prophecies; what reason could be given, why it should not be credited?—“Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?” Is not the great Creator able to restore the dead to life again? And cannot sufficient reasons be assigned for his omnipotent interposition, that his truth may be attested, his worshippers encouraged, and his name glorified? (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, John xx. 24—29.) Thus the apostle makes a natural and easy transition, from the hope of their fathers, and the doctrine of the resurrection, to that which was his principal subject; namely, the proof, which he intended to adduce, that Jesus was indeed risen, and was the promised Messiah.—Some render the eighth verse thus, “What! “Is it a thing incredible with you, if God raises the dead?” and this indeed gives a peculiar animation to the question. V. 9—11. The apostle acknowledged that he himself had formerly been extremely prejudiced against the gospel, and had thought it his duty to do many things “contrary

He had also, by means of scourging and other severities, in all the synagogues, and by threatening death, compelled many professors and favourers of Christianity, to deny and revile the Saviour as a deceiver, in language which he now thus publicly declared to be blasphemy: and in every respect he was enraged against them to a degree, which might justly be regarded as the excess of madness and insanity. not to destroy him, but to appoint him a minister of his gospel, and a witness to all men; not only of this vision, but of many other things, which he would afterwards reveal to him from time to time. (Marg. Ref. 1—o.) For executing this ministry, the Jews would indeed seek to kill him; but Jesus promised to deliver him from them, and from the Gentiles, to whom he now gave him a commission to preach his salvation. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The end and effect of his ministry among them, through the power of the Holy Spirit accompanying his word, would be “to open their eyes:” for, though their bodily eyes were open, and their intellectual powers, in secular matters, might be very penetrating; they had notwithstanding been hitherto spiritually blind, through the influence of the devil, and the depravity of their carnal minds; so that they could see nothing of the glory of God, of his truth and will, or of the way of acceptance and holiness. But, by the change to be wrought in their minds by divine grace, and the instructions of his word, they would be turned from the darkness of ignorance, error, and wickedness, to the light of divine knowledge, truth, and holiness; and from those idolatries and vices, by which they worshipped and served Satan, as his bond slaves, to the holy worship and service of the living God; that, through the gospel, they might receive a full pardon of all their sins, and be made heirs of that heavenly inheritance, to which all those who are renewed to holiness will be admitted, by faith in him, as the Saviour of lost mankind. (Marg. Ref. r—z. —Notes, Is. xlii. 5—7, 13—17, xlix. 5—13, Matt. iv. 12—17, Luke i. 76—79, iv. 16—19, Eph. v. 8—14, Col. i. 9—14, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)—The distinction between “opening their eyes, and turning them from darkness to light,” should be particularly noticed. Had the eyes of the ignorant gentiles been opened by divine grace, and no light of scriptural instruction given them; they must still have groped in the dark, as a seeing man does in a dark room: had the light of truth been sent, but the illumination of the Holy Spirit withheld; their condition would have resembled that of blind men in the full light of day. But adequate instruction was given them by the gospel, and their minds and hearts were prepared to receive it by regeneration. Paul received this commission to the Gentiles, at the time when he was converted; yet he did not preach to any but Jews and proselytes, till after Cornelius had been converted by the ministry of Peter: for he waited for farther intimations of the Lord’s will, as to the time and manner, in which he was to set about that important service; and perhaps he did not fully understand, at first, the import and extent of his charge.—To interpret the language of this passage, as if it were exclusively applicable to idolaters, implies an opinion that nominal Christians are of a better nature than other men; or that pride, covetousness, and all the other vices, by which men are enslaved to Satan, are not so heinous in professed Christians, as they are in heathens! Gross idolatry indeed has been, in this part of the world, exchanged for irreligion, infidelity, superstition, formality, and hypoerisy, among nominal Christians: but the hearts and minds of the unregenerate and unconverted are as much blinded by aversion to spiritual religion, and by the love of the world and of sin, as those of the ancient gentiles were. “Those who call themselves Christians, because they happen to be born in a Christian country; but attend neither to the doctrines, nor the duties of the gospel, seem to differ but little, with respect to the point under consideration, from those to whom the gospel was first preached: the process in both must be nearly the same.” Bp. Tomline’s Refutation of Calvinism.—May it not be added, “Because they have been baptized with water?”—By faith, &c. (18) “This may be referred to sanctified; ... but the sentence is much fuller, if we join it with the word receive.” Beza. No doubt we are “sanctified,” as well as “justified,” by faith in Christ; but the words under consideration seem to shew, that all the blessings mentioned are received by faith in Christ, and not one of them only.

ingly, he began to preach first to the Jews at Damaseus whither he went to persecute the Christians, and then in other places, and at length to the Gentiles; calling on them to repent of all their sins, to turn to the worship and service of God, and to live holy lives, as became true penitents; and thus to expect the mercy and favour of God through Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. b—h.—Notes, xx. 18—21. Matt. iii. 7—10. Luke iii. 7—14.) "For these causes the Jews," being exasperated with him, for declaring that Jesus whom they had crucified was the Messiah, and for preaching to the Gentiles, seized on him in the temple, and would have murdered him, if they had not been prevented; but, having obtained help from God, by means of Lysias, Felix, Festus, and others, his life had hitherto been preserved; and he had employed it in testifying, to the poorest of mankind, as well as to the rich and honourable, with equal plainness and faithfulness, the grace of the gospel. In doing this he had said nothing, but what entirely accorded to the types and predictions of the law, as well as to the express and repeated language of the prophets, and even of Moses their great lawgiver. As these foretold, that the promised Messiah would suffer and die, and yet that he would reign in a most glorious manner: and consequently that he should rise from the dead, as the first-fruits of the resurrection; and that he was to shew the light of salvation, not only to the people of Israel, but to the Gentiles also. V. 24—29. While Paul was confirming his testimony to the resurrection and glory of Jesus, by the predictions of scripture; and probably was preparing to adduce more particular proof, from the prophets, to each part of his doctrine; he was suddenly interrupted by Festus. He had never heard any thing before on these subjects; the resurrection of Jesus, and the vision of Paul, appeared to him incredible, or visionary in the highest degree. Probably he was astonished to hear him speak of his doctrine as of universal concernment; and aver that one, who arose among the despised Jews, was appointed to be "the Light of the Gentiles," even of the philosophical Greeks and Romans. He therefore said in a loud voice, audible by the whole assembly, "Paul, thou art beside thyself, &c." He perhaps had observed, that the apostle spent much time in retirement, study, and reading; and he supposed that, having studied very closely about certain abstract and visionary matters, his over-attention had deranged his intellects: so that he could not deem him fit either to be blamed or credited; but to be an object of mere compassion. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, 9—11. 2 Kings ix. 11. Jer. xxix. 24—32. Mark iii. 20, 21. 2 Cor. v. 13—15.) To this rude interruption before so large and splendid an audience, the apostle calmly and gravely replied, addressing the governor by the customary title of "most noble," or "most excellent;" assuring him, that he "was not mad;" and that he declared nothing but what was altogether true, of the highest importance, and able to stand the test of the most deliberate investigation. Indeed "king Agrippa" was acquainted with these subjects: the events respecting the miracles, doctrine, death, and reported resurrection of Jesus, and the subsequent promulgation of Christianity, could not have been hid from one, who was so well informed in all the affairs of the Jews; for these things had not been transacted in an obscure "corner," but in the most publick manner imaginable. (Marg. Ref. u, x. a.) He would therefore enquire of Agrippa, whether he did indeed believe, that the old prophets spake by divine inspiration, and that their predictions would be certainly fulfilled. He however knew that he would answer in the affirmative, for he doubted not but he did in this respect believe them: and he only desired

ε xxvii. 15. xxv 30 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them :

31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, ^h This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.

32 Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not ⁱ appealed unto Cæsar.

Agrippa to examine, whether they had not exactly been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth.—This appeal to the scriptures, joined to the apostle's other arguments, had so great an effect upon Agrippa's mind, that he could not conceal his convictions; but openly declared, that Paul had "almost persuaded him to be a Christian." His understanding and judgment were for the time convinced, but his heart was not changed: (Note, 2 Cor. iv. 1, 2:) and he must have been aware, that the sacrifices to be made, and the cross to be sustained, would in his case be very great. So that while he was more candid, and just in his government, than others of his family; his conduct and temper were widely distant from the spirituality and humility of the gospel. The apostle, however, desirous to fix the impression upon his mind, replied, in the genuine spirit of Christian love, that he earnestly wished and prayed that not only he, but every one in that large and splendid assembly, might not only "almost," but "altogether," embrace and be established in the faith of the gospel, and partakers of all its substantial blessings and consolations; and in short, entirely like himself in every thing, except in his bonds and imprisonment, which he would wish to bear alone. This most benevolent wish implied his full conviction of the truth of the gospel; the absolute necessity of faith in Christ in order to salvation; his own happiness as a Christian, even in his bonds; his opinion that Agrippa, Festus, and others present, did not then believe; and his fear that they would reject the gospel to their final condemnation.

V. 30—32. Agrippa, like Felix, seems to have been made very uneasy, and even alarmed, by St. Paul's convincing and impressive address: he was therefore the first to dismiss the subject, and to retire from the place of hearing. (Note, xxiv. 24—27.) His opinion, that Paul was innocent, and might have been liberated, had "he not appealed unto Cæsar," would give Festus a more favourable opinion of him: but it does not appear, that either of them, or any of those present, enquired further after Christ and his salvation; and this most admirable speech of the apostle seems to have been peculiarly unsuccessful, as to the event of it at that time. (Note, xvii. 32—34.)—Learned men have shewn, that no laws against the Christians had at this time been enacted by the Roman legislature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The Lord will never fail to give those, who for his cause are called to appear before kings, and rulers, and councils, "a mouth and wisdom, which none of their adversaries shall be able to gainsay or resist." (Notes, vi. 9—14, v. 10. Matt. x. 19, 20. Luke xxi. 12—19, v. 15.)—When Christian love abounds in the heart, it dictates a sincere language, far surpassing all compliment and worldly politeness; and teaches us to "render honour to whom honour is due," without flattery or fear of man.—That religious knowledge which unconverted men acquire, and their "expertness" about customs and questions in divinity, in general lie dormant, as mere learned lumber, in the understanding: yet, when attended with a measure of candour, they are thus rendered more accessible to truth, and more competent to judge of the evidence adduced in support of it. Nor is it any flattery to give such men the credit of their attainments; or improper to intreat a "patient" hearing, when the subject might demand the most reverent attention. (Note, Philem. 8—11.)—A moral conduct, and a form of godliness, are often connected with a bigoted aversion to the gospel; and this leads to many other heinous crimes: yet it is a mercy to be preserved, during our unconverted years, from those vices, which might afterwards disgrace our characters among worldly people, and so prevent the influence of our testimony: and this is greatly corroborated, when they, who "knew our manner of life from our youth," could testify, that we then acted consistently with our principles, and according to what we thought right; for they may thence infer, that our change of sentiment and conduct also originated from a regard to duty.—Men are often censured and persecuted for professing their hope in the express promises of God, and for a consequent expectation of the resurrection, and future state of righteous retributions: and numbers repeat creeds, subscribe doctrines, and join in forms of worship, habitually, and with apparent earnestness; and yet condemn others for explicitly professing the truths contained in them! Many things are "thought incredible," because the infinite nature and perfection of that God, who has revealed, performed, or promised them, are overlooked; and because men will not see how his power and glory are concerned in them. (Note, Matt. xxii. 23—33, v. 29.)—Those who have been most strict in their conduct, previous to conversion, will afterwards see abundant cause for deep humiliation, even on account of things, which at the time they "verily thought they

CHAP. XXVII.

Paul, attended by some friends, sails as a prisoner towards Rome, and is kindly used by the Centurion sent with him and other prisoners, 1—8. He foretels the danger of the voyage, but is not credited, 9—11.

Sailing against his advice, the company are exposed to a most violent and long continued tempest, and are in extreme danger, 10—20. Paul, encouraged by an angel, assures them that all their lives shall be preserved, but that the ship shall be wrecked, 21—26; the whole of which exactly comes to pass, 27—44.

“ought to do:” their contemptuous or injurious treatment of the saints, their opposition to the gospel, and endeavours to seduce, reason, or terrify others into a neglect of it, will often sit very heavily on their minds; and they will condemn those words, as impious and blasphemous, which they once uttered, or excited others to utter, without remorse; and allow that conduct to be madness, in which they once gloried.

V. 12—23.

The true convert can give “a reason of his hope;” and a good account of the change which has taken place in him, even when there is nothing extraordinary in his experience. (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 13—16.) Having been convinced of his guilt and danger, as a transgressor of God’s law, and a stranger to his grace, or a despiser of it; he was led to seek for mercy, and to believe in the Lord Jesus; and, being encouraged with the hope of acceptance, of increasing light, and of continued protection, he began to employ himself in his service. Thus the Lord reconciles sinners to himself, and sometimes “commits to them “the word of reconciliation:” he sends them to their fellow sinners, to “beseech them in his stead to be reconciled to him;” (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 18—21. vi. 1, 2;) and, by his power attending their word, he “opens their eyes, “turns them from darkness to light, delivers them from “the kingdom and power of Satan,” forms them spiritual worshippers of God, forgives their sins, adopts them into his family, sanctifies them by his grace, and brings them to his heavenly inheritance, by faith in his name. (Note, 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.)—Those who are thus enlightened and favoured will not be “disobedient” to the commands of the Redeemer: and all who understand and preach the gospel will perceive, that it contains directions, motives, and encouragements, to “repent, and turn to God, and “to do works meet for repentance,” addressed to men, as sinners, without discrimination; and, that it has no saving efficacy on the heart, where these fruits do not clearly appear in the life. (Notes, Tit. ii. 11—14. iii. 4—8.) Yet, for calling on men thus to “repent and be converted;” and for “witnessing none other things,” than what are evidently contained in the holy scriptures; what numbers have been execrated, persecuted, and slain, even by the professed worshippers of God! So that it is owing to the peculiar help and protection of God, when zealous and laborious preachers of the gospel are preserved from the violence of the wicked, and have their lives, and opportunities to bear their faithful testimony, continued to them: but let who may be the instruments, they should give the whole glory, both of their protection, and of their persevering faithfulness and diligence, to God alone.

V. 24—32.

The persons, whom God employs to protect his servants, often despise them as visionaries or madmen, for being so zealous about invisible objects, for believing subjects so mysterious, crediting facts of so extraordinary a nature; and relating their experience of the way in which the Lord brought them to trust in his grace, and embrace his gospel; and for attesting that the same faith and diligence, and an experience in many respects similar, are indispensably necessary to all men, both small and great, in order to their salvation. Indeed few ascribe the madness of modern teachers to deep study, or much learning: but they rather impute it to weakness of intellect, or contemptible ignorance; whatever evidences they give of good sense, enlarged minds, and extensive knowledge in other subjects. But as apostles and prophets, nay, the Son of God himself, were exposed to this obloquy; let us not be moved, if those who deemed us sober and intelligent, when we were “exceedingly mad,” should set us down for insane, when divine grace has brought us to ourselves, and made us wise unto salvation. (Note, Luke xv. 17—19.) Yet let us be careful, in these circumstances, to speak with temper; that we may disprove the charge by a dispassionate conduct, as well as by “the words of truth and soberness.” We should likewise cautiously avoid all real enthusiasm, and whatever is ambiguous or incapable of being supported by appropriate evidence; whilst we deny, and attempt to refute, the charge of being visionaries and fanatics.—It is highly important for us to lead men’s attention, by clear instructions, conclusive arguments, and well authenticated facts, to the sacred oracles, as the standard of truth; and, while we enquire, whether our hearers do indeed believe the scriptures, we should, as much as may be, take it for granted that they do: for many assent to the truth of the Bible, and pay a respect to testimonies from it, who have not yet understood or received the doctrines or salvation there revealed. Arguments and testimonies of this kind “almost persuade” numbers to be Christians, who yet are never wholly induced to leave all for Christ. When this is the case, they often grow weary of hearing the truth, and sin away conviction: and their own confessions eventually increase their condemnation for rejecting the gospel, out of love to the world, and sinful pleasures. While we beware of this fatal hesitation and irresolution in our own conduct; and recollect how far being “almost persuaded to be a “Christian” is from being altogether such a one as Paul was, or even as every true believer is; we should endeavour to impress still more deeply the minds of those, who are under serious convictions of the truth. In doing this, the language of fervent, disinterested affection is peculiarly becoming: and we should sincerely desire and pray, that others may participate all our hopes and comforts; and be exempted from our crosses and trials. Yet even this beautiful philanthropy, when expressed in the most graceful and conciliatory language, will fail to recommend the holy gospel to the carnal hearts of worldly men. They will grow weary of subjects and reflection so humiliating and solemn; and even, when they deem the preacher a man of integrity, and cannot but think he has truth on his side, they will not allow his "saying to be worthy of all acceptation;" or faith in Christ, producing prompt obedience to his precepts, to be absolutely necessary to their salvation. Alas! how many such persons have been "almost persuaded to be Christians," who nevertheless at last perished in their sins! God grant that none who read these observations may be found in that unhappy number!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1, 2. 'Paul, among prisoners in deed, and through various forms of death, yet distinguished by many splendid testimonies, is led to Rome, 'as by the hand of God himself.' Beza.—It was determined, by Festus and his council, to send Paul, with some other prisoners, to Italy; that at Rome he might be judged by the emperor, to whom he had appealed: and he was, according to the general custom, committed to the care of a centurion with soldiers under him. As this centurion belonged to the emperor's own cohort, or regiment, it is probable that he was going to Rome on other business. (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—Adramyttium was a city of Mysia, on the coast of Asia; this ship therefore, if only returning thither, could convey the company but a small part of their long voyage.—Aristarchus, of whom mention has repeatedly been made, is called by the apostle, his "fellow prisoner;" yet it is likely, that this was rather by choice than compulsion. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Col. iv. 9—14, v. 10.)—The historian himself likewise attended the apostle, and so speaks in the first person plural, in many parts of the narrative. This was a singular instance of the great affection of Luke and Aristarchus for the apostle, and a great solace to him under all his trials: and they would be in many ways assistant to him, in all his plans for usefulness, both during the voyage and after he arrived at Rome.

It may be supposed, that the opinion of Festus, and the concessions made by king Agrippa, had induced this centurion to treat Paul with attention and kindness; regarding him perhaps as an injured man, and bearing some degree of respect for his integrity and talents.—It is probable, that there were Christians at Sidon at this time, though nothing further is recorded concerning them. The centurion, and all on board the ship, must have had some general knowledge of Paul's character and principles; and the religious converse and worship of him and his friends, as well as their whole behaviour, must have excited attention: yet they probably regarded them as deluded men; entitled indeed to civil usage, being very inoffensive and well meaning, yet not worthy of notice as to their religious opinions. manity in social life, is often met with in those, who know not God; and indeed is seldom totally overcome, except by false principles, or long habits of vice. NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—9. The high priest, and elders, considered the prosecution of Paul as so important a national concern, or rather they were so indignant against him and Lysias, that they lost no time in going to Cæsarea: so that they arrived there five days after Paul left Jerusalem.—Some think that this was only five days from the time of his being apprehended; and consequently they suppose that more days were spent in his purification: but this is not likely. (Note, xxi. 27—30.)—In order to render their cause more specious before the governor, they retained a noted orator as their counsel: but dissimulation and falsehood are far more prominent in his speech, than oratorical abilities. He, however, well understood the art of flattery; and lavished high encomiums on Felix, who bore a very bad character. (Note, 24—27.) He panegyricized him, as the author of peace and prosperity to the nation; and as if the Jews had been deeply indebted to his wise foresight, beneficent plans, and prudent administration: and this in language, which at least implied such a profane disregard to divine Providence, as was not customary, in the public discourses of the most eminent persons among idolaters. read of no benefit whatever, resulting from Felix's oppressive government, except that he freed the country from those daring gangs of robbers.—All historians agree, that he was a man of so bad a character, that his government was a plague to all the provinces, over which he presided. And as for Judea, its state under Felix was so far from being what Tertullus here represents, that Josephus (besides what he says of the barbarous and cowardly assassination of Jonathan the high priest by his means,) declares that the Jews accused him before Nero of insufferable oppressions; and had certainly ruined him, if his brother Pallas had not interposed in his favour. Doddridge.—Tertullus however intimated, that he would have enlarged still more in encomiums on Felix, had he not feared being tedious to him; and therefore he intreated him, according to his known clemency, to hear him speak a few words concerning the prisoner. For they had found him to be "a pestilence," a man who infected every one with his pernicious principles, and so became a publick nuisance. He had excited the Jews to sedition all over the world; being a ringleader of a most dangerous sect, who professed allegiance to Jesus the Nazarene, and who could not therefore be supposed loyal subjects to the Roman emperor. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) But, waving other particulars, he had just before ventured to profane the temple, by bringing Gentiles into it: and when, according to the allowance of the Roman authority, they had apprehended him, and were about to proceed against him, in a legal manner; Lysias had interposed with a military force, taken the matter out of their hands, and required his accusers to come thither; by whose testimony Felix

10 Then Paul, after that the governor ^a had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years ^x a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself :

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet ^y but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for ^z to worship.

12 And they ^a neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogue, nor in the city :

13 Neither ^b can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But this ^c I confess unto thee, that ^d after the way which they call ^e heresy, so worship I ^f the God of my fathers, ^g believing all things which are written ^h in the law and in the prophets ;

15 And ⁱ have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

16 And ⁱ herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.

17 Now after many years I came ^m to bring alms to my nation, ⁿ and offerings.

18 Whereupon ^o certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult :

19 Who ^p ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me.

20 Or else let these same ^q here say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council, might be certified of the truth of all these allegations. (Marg. Ref. m—q.)—Almost every clause, in this speech, contained a palpable falsehood, as every one who compares it with the narrative must perceive: yet the abandoned high priest and elders, did not hesitate to attest the truth of it! (Marg. Ref. t.)—The high priest, the chief magistrate of the Jews, was known to be one of Paul’s accusers: yet the tribune, a subordinate officer under the Roman governor, commanded these accusers to go to Cæsarea. This shews to what entire subjection the Jews were at this time reduced. And was not then “the sceptre departed from Judah” because Shiloh was come? (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.)—The disciples long before had been named Christians: yet Tertullus still calls them Nazarenes; which shews that the disciples were not first called Christians by their enemies. (Note, xi. 25, 26, v. 26.)

V. 10—21. ‘Tertullus, by a diabolical rhetoric, begins with flatteries and ends with lies: but Paul, relying on a divine eloquence, having made a simple introduction, repels from him, by a true denial, the crime of sedition which had been brought against him.’ Beza.—Felix fully knew the disposition and character of these accusers; and, though lavishly flattered, he seems to have paid little regard to their representations. He therefore gave Paul leave to speak in his own defence; who, without seeking to conciliate favour by any compliment, began with observing, that he spake the more cheerfully before Felix, as he had been for some years a judge of that nation; (about seven years, and longer than several of his predecessors;) and so was more competent to understand questions of this nature than a stranger would have been. The apostle then observed, that only twelve days before, he had come up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, and to worship according to the law: that he had neither entered into any disputation in the temple, nor excited any insurrection in the synagogues or the city; nor could the least evidence be adduced in proof of the allegations of his accusers, respecting the profanation of the sanctuary. (Marg. Ref. u—b) Indeed he was free to confess, that he worshipped the God of his fathers, in a way which they branded as a heresy or sect (5); as if it were grounded on pernicious principles, or implied an unlawful separation: but, in fact, he believed the doctrines and promises, both of the law and the prophets, concerning the Messiah; and thus he hoped for the acceptance of God, and expected a future "resurrection both of the just and the unjust," as the Jews in general allowed: for the Sadducees, though high in rank and power, bore but a small proportion in numbers to the rest of the nation. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c-k.) In this faith and hope, the apostle daily exercised himself, after the most careful and diligent manner, to keep his conscience free from all offence, in his whole conduct towards God and man; even as a painter touches and retouches his piece continually, in order to bring it to a more exact resemblance to the objects delineated.—Accordingly, after many years' absence, he had come to Jerusalem, not as an enemy to his nation, but in a most friendly manner, bringing a sum of money, which he had collected among the Gentiles, to relieve the necessities of his poor brethren; as well as oblations to offer at the temple: and some Jews from Asia had found him in the temple, "purified" according to the law, and neither attended by a multitude, nor making a tumult. These persons ought to have been produced against him, if his prosecutors meant to prove, that he had profaned the sanctuary: but, as they had not thought proper to bring them, knowing that they could testify nothing against him in this respect; let the high priest and elders declare, whether any crime had been alleged against him, when he stood before the council; except it were criminal to profess his belief of the resurrection, and to assert that he was prosecuted on that account. V. 22, 23. The defence of Paul was simple and convincing; the charges brought against him by Tertullus were clearly refuted; and, probably, Felix concluded that the prosecution was merely a party matter. Having also more acquaintance with the reports, which had been dispersed, concerning Jesus and his doctrine, than Lysias had, he was more aware of the motives and intentions of the Jews: he therefore deferred the further hearing of the cause, till Lysias came down. He would not gratify the Jewish rulers by condemning a Roman citizen, or delivering him up to their malice; neither would he affront them by releasing him. He, however, allowed him more liberty than he had before; and by his permission the Christians of Cæsarea and others might have access to him, which would be comfortable to him and profitable to them. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, xxi. 7-14.)—'It seems to me evident, that these words,' (22) 'cannot admit the explanation of Grotius and others, that Felix deferred them, that he might have a more exact knowledge of Christianity; but, that having his residence at Cæsarea, where Cornelius the centurion and his friends were converted, where Philip the evangelist dwelt, and where there were many disciples; (xxi. 8. 16;) he became thus acquainted with the way of Christianity.' Whitby.

V. 24-27. Felix seems to have been absent from Cæsarea for a time; and on his return he brought Drusilla with him. She was daughter to that Herod, who beheaded James the brother of John; (xii. 1, 2;) and sister to king Agrippa, who is afterwards mentioned. (xxv. 13-27.) She was married to Azizus, king of the Emisenes, who had been circumcised in order to obtain her: but she had left her husband to cohabit with Felix, being a very

profligate woman.—Felix had heard many things concerning Jesus and Christianity: (Note, 22, 23 :) but he was curious to learn a more authentick and complete account of these matters from Paul; as Drusilla also seems to have been. The apostle was therefore sent for, that he might speak before the governor, concerning the “faith in Christ.”—What he said concerning the Person, miraeles, life, death, resurrection, salvation, and kingdom of Jesus, we know not: but, in order to shew his noble auditors the tendency of the gospel, and its importance to them, as well as to others; he reasoned about the nature and obligations of justice, equity, sobriety, temperance, and a proper government of the appetites and passions: and concerning a future judgment assuredly about to take place, when every man, without distinction, must “give an account of himself to God;” and, if found guilty, be punished for his crimes in a most tremendous manner. (Marg. Ref. x—c.)—This was a most suitable, bold, and faithful address of the prisoner, to this powerful, oppressive, iniquitous, and adulterous judge, and his licentious paramour; and a proper method of shewing them their need of the repentance, forgiveness, and grace of the gospel. While the licentious Jewess seems to have remained wholly obdurate; Felix was so convicted in his own conscience, that he trembled before his prisoner, from dread of the wrath to come; but, instead of enquiring, “What must I do to be saved?” he abruptly ended the conference, intimating that he was too much engaged at that time to consider the subject any further; but that when he had leisure, he would again send for Paul, and hear his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Thus his terrors and convictions soon subsided; his avarice, and other corrupt passions, retained their full dominion: and, knowing that the Christians were eminently liberal, by general report, as well as by what he had heard of the alms and oblations sent by the apostle to Jerusalem; he hoped that they would buy his liberty with a considerable sum of money. (Marg. Ref. g.) He therefore kept Paul in prison, and frequently sent for him, and talked with him, but not concerning the faith of Christ: and at length, when succeeded by another governor; he left the apostle bound, in order to please the Jews by this act of injustice, and so prevent them from accusing him before the emperor. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, and P. O. Mark vi. 14—29.) But in this he was disappointed; for they accused him of extortion and oppression, and he narrowly cseaped punishment on that account. Neither the apostle, nor his friends, would purchase his liberty, by becoming accessory to the bribery and extortion of Felix: they would not “do evil, that good might come.”—“It was during the two years of Paul’s imprisonment here that those contentions arose between the Jews and Gentiles, as to their respective rights in Cæsarea, which, after many tumults and slaughters of the Jews, were inflamed, rather than appeased, by the hearing at Rome, and did a great deal towards exasperating the Jewish nation to that war, which ended in its utter ruin. ... She (Drusilla) was afterwards ... consumed, with the son she had by Felix, in a terrible eruption of mount Vesuvius.’ Doddridge.—‘It is no wonder that Felix trembled; and that Drusilla did not so also was an argument of her Jewish confidence, that she might then’ (in the day of judgment,) ‘escape by being a daughter of Abraham.’ Whitby.—The conduct of the trembling jailor at Philippi and that of Felix, should be carefully and minutely compared; for the contrast is in every particular striking and instructive. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The selfish and malignant passions of mankind are too commonly the spring of that prompt and persevering activity, which generally prevails: and the graces of language and elocution have very commonly been tarnished by falsehood and flattery; and employed rather to mislead men, and prejudice them against the truth, than to influence them to favour and embrace it.—The persecutors of the Lord’s people have commonly been the panegyrists of his open enemies: and deviations from truth, by compliments, inure the mind to dissimulation; and thus prepare the way for the most direct slander and false testimony.—In how different a light will the characters of Paul and Felix, appear, at the day of judgment, than they do in Tertullus’s harangue! Let us not then value the applause, or be troubled at the revilings of ungodly men: as the basest and most eriminal of the human race have been almost deified by encomiums, and the excellent of the earth have been treated as “pestilence,” as “movers of sedition,” and deserving of universal execration; and this by professors of the true religion! by priests, elders, and persons of chief authority in the visible church!—But the servants of God must not attempt, by flattery, to conciliate the favour of those, who seem to have the most absolute power over them: nor should they retort on their accusers, further than is necessary for the refutation of their slanders. They should also be ready to confess their faith when called upon, and the foundation of their hope, though they be deemed heretical and sectarian by their enemies; and take occasion to shew the agreement of their principles with the word of God, and with the doctrines professed in his church; especially to call men's reflection to the resurrection of the dead, and the future season of righteous retribution. But they have never rightly understood the doctrines of St. Paul, and are not proper persons to plead for them, who do not “exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man.” (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 13—16.) In a continual application of the blood of Jesus, and an habitual dependence on his grace, we should daily seek to have our conduct and temper more and more conformed to his holy precepts, as the rule of our duty. Thus our actions will recommend our principles; our kindness even to those who injure us will expose the malignity of our accusers; and a sober, righteous, and godly life will prove the most effectual refutation of all their calumnies.

V. 22—27.

Those who are openly irreligious, and even immoral, often shew more favour to zealous believers, than hypocritical bigots do: yet their selfish designs commonly prevent them from doing impartial justice.—Many curiously enquire after the faith in Christ, who are utterly averse to its holy tendency. We should not therefore amuse enquirers of this description with speculation, or even bare unapplied scriptural truths; but we ought to “reason with them concerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;” and to level the word of God against the peculiar vices of their conduct, without fear of their displeasure, how powerful soever they may be. This alone can make them sensible of their need of “faith in Christ,” and prepare them to understand the doctrine of the gospel; and such opportunities ought not to be lost.—So great is the power of divine truth, that it can overawe the consciences of the most potent and profligate, and can make a prince tremble before his prisoner. How then will the wicked be able to stand before the judgment-seat of God?—But many, when thus affected, will hear no more: they will in effect say to the minister or the book that alarms them, nay, to their own consciences, “Go thy way at this time:” they will pretend business, engagements, and impediments, at present; and they hope to be hereafter more favourably circumstanced, or better disposed; and then they will attend to the concerns of their souls. Thus, through procrastination, the hopeful impression wears off: iniquity retains its dominion in their hearts; and the evident love of worldly gain, or some other corrupt indulged propensity, clearly explains the reason of their rejection of the divine message. (Note, John iii. 19—21.)—Thus “the convenient time” never arrives; they continue to sin on to the end of life against their better knowledge; and the faithfulness of their reprovers serves only to aggravate their future condemnation. Hence also it is that wicked professors of religion are the most hardened of all sinners; because they have so often and so resolutely done this violence to their own consciences, that they at length become totally callous. (Note, 1 Tim. iv. 1—5.) “To day” therefore, let all that would be saved, attend to the voice of God; “lest he swear in his wrath, that they shall never enter into his rest.” (Notes, Luke xiii. 22—30, vv. 25—28. Heb. iii. 7—13. P. O. 7—19.)

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—5. The implacable malice of the high priest and the rulers against Paul, whose long imprisonment could not soften them; and their dark design of assassinating him, mark the horrible wickedness of the Jews, a short time before their final ruin, of which Josephus gives a most awful account.—It was very wonderful that Festus should refuse to gratify the great men of the nation, which he was appointed to govern, by sending for Paul to Jerusalem; as he staid in that city long enough to have heard his cause there. But God was pleased thus to influence his mind, in order to Paul's preservation. (Marg. Ref. c—c.)—“When we consider, how much edification to the churches depended on Paul's life, and how evidently, under God, his life depended on this resolution of Festus; it must surely lead us to reflect, by what invisible springs the blessed God governs the world; with what silence, and yet at the same time with what wisdom and energy!” Doddridge.—Able. 6 And when he had tarried among them more than ten days, he went down unto Cæsarea; and the next day, sitting in the judgment-seat, commanded Paul to be brought.

7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove;

8 While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended any thing at all.

9 But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest.

11 For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but, if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Cæsar.

12 Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar shalt thou go.

13 ¶ And after certain days, king Agrippa and Bernice came unto Cæsarea, to salute Festus.

14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's

V. 9—11. Festus, though doubtless more and more convinced of Paul's innocence, being very desirous of acquiring favour with the principal persons among the Jews, proposed to Paul, that he should "go up to Jerusalem," and be judged there before him, in the presence of the council. This proposal renders it the more wonderful, that he did not before send for him to Jerusalem, at the request of the same persons. (Marg. Ref. l.—Note, 1—5, vv. 4, 5.)—It may be supposed that Festus was not aware of a conspiracy formed against his life: but probably the apostle was fully informed of it; or at least was assured, that no kind or degree of violence or deceit would be wanting to murder him. And, though assured by the Lord himself, that he should "bear testimony to "him at Rome," he used all proper means for his own preservation: so far was he from thinking, that the divine decrees and man's free agency were incompatible; or that the purposes of God, even when known, render the use of means needless or useless. (Notes, ii. 22—24. iv. 23—28. xxiii. 11. xxvii. 29—32.)—The Roman governors were the emperor's representatives: the apostle, therefore, as a Roman citizen, when standing at the tribunal of Festus, was in the place where "he ought to be judged;" but, should he be sent to Jerusalem to be tried under the influence of the Jewish rulers, he would, independently of plots and conspiracies, be deprived of his privilege. Had any crime been charged upon him, which deserved death, he might have waived this privilege; but as Festus well knew that this was not the case, yet was ready to give him into the hands of his enemies, as a special favour by which he hoped to conciliate them, which no man had a right to do; the apostle felt himself authorized, and thought that Festus must see that he did right, in "appealing to "Cæsar," and demanding that the emperor himself should decide his cause. (Marg. Ref. m—q.—Notes, xvi. 35—40. xxii. 22—30.)—Nero, who is still infamous for his excessive cruelty, was at that time the Roman emperor.

He had received the title of king from the Roman emperors, and dominion over several districts, without the boundaries of the promised land; and also over a part of Galilee. He had also considerable authority at Jerusalem, over the concerns of the temple; yet in subordination to the Roman governors. Bernice was his sister, a woman of a licentious character, who was suspected of living in incest with him. In other respects Agrippa bore a good character; being equitable in his administration, of a generous disposition, and paying a strict attention to the externals of religion. (Marg. Ref.)

The motive of Festus, in bringing Paul before this splendid company, evidently was, that he might collect something from Agrippa and those present which would enable him to write to the emperor, in a manner more creditable to himself, and less unreasonable or absurd, than it seemed to him in present circumstances practicable for him. But God had far other and higher reasons for influencing his mind to a measure, in various respects leading to most important consequences. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The malignant enmity of hardened persecutors cannot be worn out by length of time, or satisfied with any sufferings of those against whom they are enraged, unless terminating in their violent death. They deem it a peculiar favour, when rulers will gratify their malice; and they have no scruples about conspiracies, assassinations, or massacres, when legal forms fail of effecting their purposes. We cannot therefore too much watch against the feeblest risings of that principle, which may be matured into such dire excesses.—But God limits the rage of the most unprincipled men, by the intervention of others, not at all more conscientious, in many things, than themselves: (Note, Ps. lxxvi. 10 :) and sometimes he influences them unaccountably to act contrary to their own general purposes, in such particulars as form a part of his plan.—Happy will it be for us, when “many and grievous complaints are brought against us,” if our accusers can prove none of them; and if we can shew, that we have conscientiously obeyed the civil magistrate, behaved peaceably in the community, and attended to the ordinances and worship of God. (Note, 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.) When these things are evident, a man may have great boldness before his judges, in appealing to their consciences with respect to his innocence; or in claiming the protection of the law, against the iniquity of those who long to be gratified by his punishment. But how scandalous is it to the professors and ministers of religion; when the true, exemplary, and zealous servants of God are compelled to appeal from their bigotted malice, to the decision of idolaters, and even to that of the most cruel tyrants, as more likely to do them justice than they are!

The most important questions, which relate to the worship of God, the way of eternal salvation, and the grand truths of the gospel, appear dubious and uninteresting to the politicians and wise men of the world. They can see, however, and condemn the mismanagement, into which men are betrayed by an indiscreet or furious zeal; and this confirms them in their sceptical disregard of religion in general. Yet the day is at hand, when Festus and the whole world will know, that all the temporal concerns of the immense Roman empire were frivolous, as the toys and sports of children, compared with the single question, whether Jesus the crucified was risen from the dead, according to the doctrine of the apostle, or was not risen. Then those who have had the means of instruction, and have despised them, will be most awfully convinced of their sin and folly. But alas! many, who seem to desire information on such questions, only want to gratify a vain curiosity, and not to learn the way to heaven: “and the great pomp,” with which some of the rich and honourable of this world, attend at “the places of hearing the word of God,” say, at the Lord’s table, shew, that they are actuated by the same motives as Paul’s splendid auditory was, though in a far more aggravated manner.—Ministers indeed do not commonly now stand in fetters, as prisoners, to make their defence before their hearers; yet numbers affect rather to sit in judgment on them, as “offenders for a word,” than to learn from them the truth and will of God, for the salvation of their own souls: and alas, too many preachers seem far more anxious to collect together and to please their genteel and splendid congregations; than to “declare the whole counsel of God,” and to “keep themselves pure from the blood of all men.” (Notes, xx. 18—21. 25—27. P. O. 13—31.)

V. 20—26. The mariners could not make any usual observations, because the sun and stars were totally hidden by clouds; they were not able, therefore, to discover to what part of the sea they had been driven: and, as the tempest still lay hard upon them, and allowed them no respite to repair their shattered vessel, they gave up all for lost; and expected every moment to go to the bottom, or to be dashed upon the rocks. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) This prepared them to regard the words of Paul, which in other circumstances they probably would have contemptuously neglected. As he had before been assured of bearing testimony to Jesus at Rome, he was probably composed during the whole tempest; but the Lord was pleased to send him further assurances, respecting his own preservation, and that of all the company. (Note, xxiii. 11.) After they had all neglected, for some time, to take proper sustentance, through the terror of immediate death; and after Paul and his friends had, perhaps, spent some time in prayer; he stood forth before the mariners, and reminded them of the divine admonition he had before given them, which they ought to have unreservedly obeyed: (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, 10:) and by neglecting of which they had "gained" nothing of what they had expected, but only exposed themselves to great injury and disgrace. He, however, exhorted them to be of good courage, for he was authorized to assure them of the preservation of all their lives. For that God, whose he was in an especial manner, whom he worshipped continually, and whom he served with all his powers and capacities, by preaching the gospel of his Son, (Marg. Ref. n—r.—Notes, Dan. vi. 10—23. Rom. i. 8—12,) had sent his angel, (who knew where to find him, though they knew not where they were,) and by him God had assured him of being preserved to stand before the Roman emperor; and also had informed him, that he had granted his prayers and fervent desires, and for his sake, and as a special favour to him, would save the lives of all those who sailed with him. He therefore exhorted them to be cheerful, and hope amidst their perils; for he believed assuredly that God would fulfil his word, as he knew him to be always faithful to his promises. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) The ship, however, would certainly be wrecked, and they would be east "upon an island," and not on any part of the continent, either of Europe, Asia, or Africa: by which circumstance it would be manifested that he spake by revelation from God. (Notes, xxviii. 1, 2. Gen. xviii. 23—33. xix. 27—29.)

The mariners, finding by the line, that the depth of the water decreased on every sounding, were afraid of being driven, in the dark, on the rocks or sands, which are found near the shore, and therefore used their utmost endeavours to bring the ship to anchor: waiting with earnest longings for day light, that they might discover where they were, and what methods could be used for their preservation. (Marg. Ref. e, d.—Note, Ps. exxx. 5, 6.) They were fully sensible of the extreme danger, to which the ship was exposed; but they hoped to save themselves in the boat, thus leaving the passengers to perish. This selfish purpose, however, they endeavoured to conceal: but the apostle, perceiving what they were about to do, assured the centurion and the soldiers, that they could not be preserved, unless the mariners remained with them; and they paid so much regard to his judgment, as immediately to cut the ropes, by which the boat was fastened, and to give her up to the sea. (Note, 16.) It was the purpose of God to save the lives of the company by means of the mariners, and they must not tempt him, by neglecting the proper method of self-preservation. (Marg. Ref. h, i. —Note, Matt. iv. 5—7.)—Nothing could be more absolute than the promise above given (24): yet neither the centurion nor the soldiers charged Paul with inconsistency, in what he now said to them. If the end was absolutely decreed, the means of attaining it were so likewise; and the case is the same, in concerns of still higher importance.—‘God hath indeed assured me, that none of all our ‘lives shall miscarry in this danger; but that God, who ‘hath ordained our preservation, hath also ordained the ‘means thereof, and therefore hath appointed, that these ‘mariners shall continue in the ship, if we will hope for ‘safety.’ *Bp. V. 33—38. Till day-light should make way for using proper means of preservation, the apostle shewed the whole company, that they might make a most important use of the time, by taking seasonable food. During a fortnight, the tremendous violence of the tempest had kept them from making any regular meal, or taking even needful sustenance: so that they were greatly weakened, not only by fatigue and terror, but also by abstinence. This seems the most natural and obvious meaning of the language here used, which was no doubt in some degree

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40 And when they had * taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder-bands, " and hoised up the main-sail to the wind, and made toward shore.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, ^x they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was ^y broken with the violence of the waves.

42 And ^z the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out and escape.

43 But the centurion, ^a willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim, should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, ^b that they escaped all safe to land.

* Or, cut the anchors, they left them in the sea, &c. 29, 30.

hyperbolic: but some think, that they were put on short allowance, as the voyage was likely to be much longer than had been expected. St. Paul therefore, whose influence no doubt continually and rapidly increased, urged them to take adequate refreshment; that they might be strengthened for the arduous struggle, which would be necessary, in order to their deliverance from such perilous circumstances; and that their health might not be impaired, seeing that God would certainly preserve their lives. (Marg. Ref. m.) Having, therefore, with all the boldness and confidence arising from a clear conscience and a well grounded hope in God, "given thanks" to him, in the most publick manner, for the food afforded them, and the promise vouchsafed them; he, by his own example, led them to take a regular and cheerful meal: and being fully satisfied with food, and knowing that a few hours must terminate their perils, they cast the remainder of their provisions, as well as of the lading, (for probably the ship was freighted with wheat,) into the sea, as a measure conducive to their preservation. The soldiers, perceiving that all must shift for themselves; and supposing, that if any of the prisoners should escape, the survivors of their guards would be called to account for it, advised the immediate execution of the whole company, though yet uncondemned. This could not have been thought of, had not the Roman laws allowed it, or had it not been sometimes done. So that this cruel and unfeeling policy disgraced the jurisprudence of the renowned Romans! Indeed the centurion himself seems not to have been at all shocked by the proposal: and he was induced, rather by a personal regard to Paul, than by general principles, either of humanity or justice, to negative the counsel; and this at a time too, when his own life and that of the soldiers were in as much peril, as the lives of the prisoners! (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—Thus the apostle, in this respect also, proved a blessing to his companions in suffering: (Note, Gen. xii. 1—3, v. 3 :) and by the special interposition of Providence, every one of the numerous company got safe to shore.—It is highly reasonable to suppose, that these extraordinary incidents were over-ruled to the conversion and salvation of many of their souls. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20.

The Lord provides kind friends, and adequate consolations, for his faithful servants, in all their multiplied and varied trials: and even such persons, as might previously have been expected to be inimical to them, are sometimes induced to treat them courteously, and to minister to their refreshment; nor shall these fail of receiving a suitable reward.—Zealous and able ministers cannot, in any situation, be wholly excluded from usefulness: and their gracious God often causes them to pass through troubles, to manifest the power of his consolations in supporting them, and the excellency of their principles and character; in order to excite the attention of the careless, the ignorant, and the prejudiced, to their example and instructions. Their admonitions, however, will generally be at first slighted, even by those worldly men, who behave in a friendly manner: for, while persons of this description give them credit for good meaning, they generally have a very mean opinion of their sagacity. Thus, in hopes of avoiding difficulties, or obtaining conveniences and advantages, the counsels of heavenly wisdom are slighted: and, when Providence seems to favour men's carnal projects, they are sanguine in concluding that they have gained their purpose. But disobedience to the counsel and command of God however made known, will surely lead men into troubles and dangers; and the event will convince them, that their hopes were vain, and their conduct foolish.—What labour do almost all men employ, and what sacrifices do they readily make, in order to preserve their lives, when in imminent danger! Yet how few are willing to labour, or to renounce temporal interest or pleasure, to escape

Paul and his company depart; and having arrived within some miles of Rome, they are met by brethren from that city, 11—15. Paul is entrusted to a soldier, and dwells in his own lodging, 16. He sends for the chief of the Jews, and shews them the occasion of his coming, 17—22. He proves to a large company, from the scriptures, that Jesus is the Christ, 23. Some believe, and others do not, 24. He solemnly warns the unbelievers, and shews that the Gentiles would receive his word, 25—29. He continues during two years, to preach the gospel in his own hired house, without interruption, 30, 31.

impending and eternal destruction! (P. O. Is. ii. 10—22. Notes, Matt. x. 27, 28. xvi. 24—28. P. O. 21—28.)—Groundless hopes are often succeeded by desponding fears; but when sinners renounce all hope of saving themselves, they are prepared to understand the word of God, and to trust in his free mercy through Jesus Christ.

V. 21—44.

It is an unspeakable advantage, when the distressed, and those who draw near to death, have some persons at hand, to direct them to the true Foundation of hope and Source of consolation: and opportunities of this kind should be diligently improved. (Notes, Job xxxiii. 19—30. P. O. 14—33.)—It may be proper to remind the afflicted, that they have brought their troubles on themselves, by neglecting good counsel, and by disobeying the commandments of God: but we must also encourage them to hope in his mercy, and in his gracious promises.—“The Lord knoweth “them that are his;” and holy angels are ready to minister to them, wherever they go. If we can truly say, “His I am, and him I serve,” the whole scripture says to us, “Fear not;” and he frequently spares the lives, and in numerous instances even saves the souls, of others, for the sake, and in answer to the prayers, of his redeemed and devoted servants. So that they are “a blessing,” to every family and neighbourhood in which they reside, and in all places to which they travel.—The comfort of God's precious promises cannot be enjoyed, without a believing dependence on them; and the fulfilment of them must be waited for, in a diligent attendance on the appointed means of grace.—If he have “chosen us in Christ” to eternal salvation; he has also determined, that we shall obtain it in the way of repentance, faith, prayer, watchfulness, and diligent persevering obedience: and it is the most fatal presumption to expect it in any other way. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Thes. ii. 13—17.)—Men in general are so selfish, that they are ready to provide for their own preservation, even by such measures as directly conduce to the destruction of those, with whom they are most intimately connected! No peril or sufferings can subdue human depravity: so that soldiers and sailors, who experience more hardships, dangers, and evident deliverances than other men; and who it might be thought, would be more careful than others to be always prepared for death and judgment; are too commonly peculiarly regardless of religion and morality!—We must, however, endeavour to accommodate ourselves, as far as we conscientiously can, to those among whom we are placed; and to excite, encourage, and instruct them, by our example and conversation, to trust in the Lord, to thank him for all their comforts, to obey his commands, and to use the proper means of securing their own interest and happiness.—The promises of God cannot be frustrated by the most formidable dangers, nor can his purposes be defecated by any endeavours of his creatures: it is therefore our part, to attend on our present duty, and to leave events with him.—All true believers will certainly obtain eternal life and happiness, even as all this company obtained temporal deliverance. Their difficulties, perils, alarms, temptations, and distresses may be many, and of various kinds. They will sometimes have such hair-breadth escapes, as to remind them of the apostle's words, “the righteous scarcely are saved;” and their preservation and victories will be effected in different ways, beside and beyond their expectation. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39. 1 Pet. iv. 17—19.) They will often, under dark and gloomy dispensations, be required to wait for some token of the Lord's favour, (when they have no light or comfort day after day,) with more earnestness, than these mariners wished for the dawn. It will, however, at length, so come to pass, that by one means or another, they will all escape safe to heaven, where mutual congratulations and admiring praises and thanksgivings, will succeed their present trials and distresses, and will not be terminated or interrupted to all eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1, 2. The small island of Melita, lies to the south of Sicily. It is now called Malta: for many ages it belonged to the knights of Malta, and recent events have made its name familiar to most readers. Probably, it was peopled by a colony of Phœnicians: and the inhabitants were called “barbarians” by the Greeks and Romans, who gave this name to all the rest of the world. The islanders however, were noted for their humanity and kindness to strangers; and their conduct to the shipwrecked company, in their urgent distress, corresponded with that character. As they were all wet, cold, destitute, and almost ready to perish; they kindled a large fire in some place sheltered from the weather, which was cold and rainy, and there entertained and refreshed them, in the best way they could. (Marg. Ref. e, d.)

V. 3—6. The apostle knew how to accommodate himself to any circumstances: and, as the situation of the company required it, he readily assisted in making the fire. But in doing this, he was exposed to a more imminent danger, even than that which he had just escaped. The bite of a viper was supposed to be fatal; and as this viper was irritated by the heat, it might be expected, that it would immediately bite him. When therefore the islanders, who had some general notions of a superior power engaged to punish atrocious criminals, saw this fierce and destructive animal fasten on his hand, they looked on him as a dead man: and, perceiving that he was a prisoner, they concluded that he had committed murder, and so had exposed himself to divine vengeance; and that he had escaped from the sea, only that he might be punished in a more exemplary manner. (Marg. Ref. f. h—k.—Notes, Luke xiii. 1—5.) But when, after a considerable time, they saw that no harm followed, they went into the opposite extreme, and concluded that he was one of their deities, thus become visible among them. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, xiv. 11—20. Mark xvi. 17, 18. Luke x. 17—20. Rom. xvi. 17—20, v. 20.) They did not indeed, at this time, know any thing of the true God, whose invisible power had thus preserved the life of his servant; but the impression, which these events made on their minds, would conduce to render them afterwards more observant of the apostle's conversation and behaviour.

entertained the whole company three days, till they could be conveniently accommodated elsewhere. Thus Paul became acquainted with the sickness of the governor's father, who was confined by a most painful and dangerous disease; and when he had (doubtless by his own proposal) prayed for him, and laid his hands on him, he was immediately healed. This must have been a very acceptable return to Publius for his liberal courtesy; and would also excite general attention towards the apostle and his instructions. Accordingly, sick persons from every part of the island were brought to him, and were healed. (Marg. Ref. p—t.) No doubt Paul and his companions zealously improved these opportunities of preaching the gospel; and probably they had considerable success during the three months of their continuance in the island. (11) So that at length they were greatly honoured, as highly favoured by the Lord, and as having abundantly requited the kindness shewn them. The whole company were treated with respect, chiefly on the apostle's account; and all their wants were liberally supplied when they departed. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) It is, however, reasonable to conclude from this compendious narrative, that the conduct and discourses of St. Paul and his friends, and all the events of the shipwreck and deliverance, had made a deep impression on the minds of the soldiers, sailors, and passengers; and that they too had behaved so well at Melita, as to conciliate the esteem and favour of the inhabitants.—‘ No one will ever repent of having entertained a servant of God, however wretched and indigent.’ Beza.

embarked as passengers on board an Alexandrian vessel. Castor and Pollux, according to the heathen fables, were twin sons of Jupiter by Leda; and, as a subordinate kind of deities, were supposed to be concerned in the protection of mariners. The images, therefore, of these brothers were placed at the head or the stern of the ship; or, as some think, on both. The apostle had no option, whether he would sail in a ship thus stamped by idolatry; but it is probable, that most ships were, in one way or other, distinguished by some things connected with the prevalent idolatrous sentiments and observances; and, as merely a passenger, he would not have regarded it, had he been at liberty.—Syracuse was the capital city of Sicily, Rhegium was a town on the southern extremity of Italy, and Puteoli a sea-port on the south-west side of it. At Puteoli the company landed; and, finding some Christians, the apostle and his friends were desired by them, and allowed by the centurion, to spend a week with them. The centurion's regard to Paul evidently increased during the whole voyage; but it is not said, whether he at length became a Christian, or not. (Marg. Ref.)

They knew him especially as ° the apostle of the gentiles; ° and the epistle, which he had some time before written to them, had no doubt impressed them with the highest veneration for his character. (Marg. Ref. d. Preface to Romans. Notes, Rom. i. 8—12. xv. 22—29.)—Appii forum is computed to have been fifty-one miles from Rome, and The three taverns, thirty-three.—This testimony of respect appears to have been very reasonable: for the circumstances in which the apostle was about to make his first visit to this renowned city, compared with the expectations which he had before expressed, concerning visiting the church there, were suited to damp his hopes of being

When the company arrived at Rome, the other prisoners were committed to the custody of the captain of the imperial guards, to be lodged in prison: but, through the account sent by Festus, and the report of Julius, Paul was exempted from this hardship, and was allowed to dwell in a lodging apart from other prisoners; and only guarded by a soldier, to whom it is supposed that he was chained. V. 17—20. ' Paul every where remembers that he is an ' apostle.' Beza.—When the apostle and his friends had arranged their private concerns, and settled themselves in some lodging, as well as they could; he lost no time in sending for the principal persons of his nation to come to him, as he could not go to them. When they were come, he stated to them, that though he had not injured any of his people, or committed any offence against their laws and customs; yet he had been apprehended at Jerusalem, and delivered as a criminal into the hands of the Romans; and at length had been constrained in his own defence to appeal to the emperor. In this statement, he carefully avoided all mention of the violent attempt which had been made on his life, and the subsequent plots which had been formed to assassinate him. (Notes, xxv. 1—12.) He desired to satisfy his countrymen, that he had no ill will to his nation, or resentments against individuals, or intention of accusing them before the Romans. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) It was, however, a fact, that he had not committed any crime, for which he ought to be thus prosecuted; but that he was a prisoner, entirely on account of professing that hope in the Messiah, which was common to the nation; only that he held it with respect to Jesus, who had been crucified and was risen from the dead. (Note, xxvi. 4—8.) His address was the language of candour, caution, and benevolence; and he spake of his chain with great indifference, being willing to wear it for Christ's sake. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, Gen. xl. 14, 15. 2 Tim. i. 6—13.)

V. 21, 22. The leading persons of the Jews replied to the apostle, that they had received no account by letters, publick or private, concerning him from Judea; nor had they heard any of those who came to Rome, accuse him of any crime: but they desired to hear his sentiments concerning Jesus, seeing " this sect," or heresy, of the Nazarenes, or Christians, was every where spoken against, as destructive of the religion of their ancestors, the source of many disorders, and injurious to mankind. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, xxiv. 1—21. xxvi. 4—8.) This answer shews, that the Jews in Judea despaired of success in following up their accusations at Rome; and that immense pains had been taken to misrepresent the Christians, in every part of the world.

V. 23—29. The apostle proceeded in the same manner, with the Jews in his lodgings, as he had before been used to take in their synagogues; explaining the nature and privileges of the Redeemer's kingdom and salvation; " testifying " to the facts by which it was introduced; proving from the scriptures of the prophets, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and persuading them to believe d 1s. vi. 9, 10. 26 Saying, ^d Go unto this people, and say, ^e Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive:

e 27 For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, in him. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) Thus, in the earnestness of his zealous and benevolent soul, he spent the whole day: and though some were won over to the faith, yet it appears that most present rejected his testimony and even disputed against such as believed. Therefore the apostle parted from them, by observing, that the Holy Spirit had well described their disposition, and awfully denounced their doom, by the prophet Isaiah. The passage has already been considered. (Marg. Ref. e—e.—Notes, Is. vi. 9, 10. John xii. 37—41.) ‘As for the quotation from Isaiah, which he applies to them, I would observe, that it is quoted oftener than any other text from the Old Testament, (that is, six times,) in the New: (here and Matt. xiii. 14, 15. Mark iv. 12. Luke viii. 10. John xii. 40. Rom. xi. 8 :) yet in such a variety of expression ‘as plainly proves, the apostles did not confine themselves exactly, either to the words of the original, or of the Greek version.’ Doddridge. St. Paul had observed, during the whole of his ministry, that the nation in general thus closed their eyes and ears to the truth; and he foresaw with great concern, that God was about to give them up to judicial blindness and obduracy for their sins. He would, however, assure them, that the Gentiles, to whom the salvation of God was sent by his ministry, would hear and obey his word. The Jews being thus warned, had, when departing, much reasoning and disputation among themselves in consequence of what they had heard; and probably afterwards some of them embraced the gospel. V. 30, 31. The rulers of the Jews did not follow up their prosecution of Paul, on his appeal to the emperor, who at the present took no notice of the matter: thus the apostle remained two years longer a prisoner at Rome. He was, however, allowed to hire a house, and there openly to exercise his ministry, proclaiming “the kingdom of God,” the reign of the Messiah; (Note, Matt. iii. 2;) and teaching all things that related to the Lord Jesus, shewing that he was indeed the Messiah. This he did without meeting with the least interruption, which shews that Nero’s persecution was not begun at this time. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) With this remark Luke closed his history: probably the apostle was soon after set at liberty; though it is generally agreed that he afterwards suffered martyrdom at Rome. (Preface to the second Epistle to Timothy.)—Doubtless Luke, Aristarchus, and others who attended on the apostle, or came to him, being themselves at liberty, laboured diligently to make the gospel known in the city and its vicinity, during all the time of the apostle’s imprisonment; though the historian, by a modesty almost unprecedented, is wholly silent concerning his own labours and sufferings.—Several of St. Paul’s epistles were written during this imprisonment. (Prefaces to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, Hebrews.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Those who are despised for their rude and uncultivated manners, are often more hospitable, and shew more genuine philanthropy than their more polished neighbours: and heathens, or reputed barbarians, will rise up in judgment against many persons, in this civilized Christian nation, who do not scruple to embezzle the property, or injure the persons, of such as are cast upon our shores.—True dignity has no need of affected stateliness; and pride or sloth alone deems that beneath any man, which the present exigency requires for personal or social advantage.—We are always in danger in ourselves, and always safe when under God’s protection: and he leads his servants through perils to illustrate their characters, or to shew his power in their deliverance.—Even uninformed and barbarous people have a horror of “murder,” and an apprehension of divine vengeance on those who commit it: but this may give rise to erroneous judgments; as it is not so generally considered, that the wicked are often reserved, for future and more terrible punishment. (Note, 2 Pet. ii. 4—9.)—They, whose minds are destitute of due information, are peculiarly apt to pass from one extreme to the other; and to decide on men's characters rather by their success, than by their actions.—The Lord raises up friends to his people, in every place whither he leads them; he rewards, or enables them to requite, their benefactors in a suitable manner; and he renders them a blessing to all who are connected with them.—The cure of diseases, though valuable, is far more so when united with the means of grace and salvation; and the friends, who are raised up to a pious man by his good behaviour and usefulness, will be above all others affectionate and liberal; as far as this is needful and consistent.

V. 11—31.

The ordinary transactions of travelling are seldom worth a recital: but the comfort of 'communion with the saints,' and the kindness shewn us by our friends, are deserving of a more particular mention.—The respect and love, which lively Christians bear to faithful ministers, even though they have never seen them, will induce them sometimes to go far to converse with them: nor should they esteem them the less, on account of their sufferings for the gospel. This conduct is the more incumbent upon them; as the most eminent servants of God are liable to discouragements, and need somewhat to refresh their hopes under long continued trials and temptations.—The Lord moderates the afflictions of his people, as it is best for them; and he can render them easy under their remaining troubles. They should therefore be prompt to every service in their power: they also ought to obviate prejudices, which hinder their usefulness, as far as they can; and in refuting the charges brought against them, they should be candid, and express good-will towards their enemies.—Should we be called to wear a chain for Christ's sake, we ought not to be ashamed of it, but to glory in it: and though real Christians are every where, and at all times, in this deluded ungodly world, "spoken against," as a precise, troublesome, or fanatical sect; yet we may so behave, that none can speak any personal harm of us.—We should ever be ready to declare our sentiments of Christ and the gospel, to those who desire to hear them: and if the audience did not grow weary, there are times when a zealous minister could expound, and "testify the kingdom of God," and "persuade men concerning Jesus, from morning till evening." Yet at last we must be thankful, if some believe, though far more reject our testimony with pertinacious contempt. But we must shew those who disbelieve, what the Holy Spirit has spoken concerning them, and how the scriptures are fulfilled in them: and warn them not to close their hearts in obstinate unbelief, lest God should judicially leave them to be blinded and hardened to their destruction.—While we mourn on account of despisers, we should rejoice that "the salvation of God is sent" to others, who will receive it; and, if we ourselves be of this number, how thankful should we be to him who has made us to differ!—If under reproach and persecution, the true minister can obtain leave and liberty to preach the gospel, and is favoured with success; he will think his sufferings amply compensated: and be reconciled to his own want of liberty, if he finds that "the word of God hath free course, and is glorified."
